Technology spreads, spurs state economy

Colorado Tech directory reflects growing sector

JEFF NUTTALL

ANDREA YOUNG
CEO, COLORADO TECHNOLOGY ASSOCIATION

Colorado's technology sector contines to amaze even long-time observers. Hardly a week goes by that the Centennial State — or a community or region within the state — scores high on some national tech-related ranking.

Tech makes up a huge part of the state's economy, and national and global media mention the state often, whether it's recounting Colorado's role in space exploration — thanks, Ball and Lockheed Martin! — or highlighting growth at companies such as Google.

What's exceptional is how widespread the tech economy has become in Colorado. It's hard to find any pocket along the Front Range that isn't seeing expansion in one tech sector or another. (Been to Lower Downtown Denver lately?)

Incubators and accelerators are starting up all over, many focused on specific niches, and Startup Weeks have emerged in many communities.

All told, tech accounts for 11.5 percent of the state's economy, according to the Cyberstates 2016 report by the Computing Technology Industry Association, with concentrations in aerospace, bioscience, clean tech, computer systems, data storage, mobile apps, software, telecommunications and much more.

Tech employs more than 187,000 workers in the state, according to the report, generating an average wage of $106,350 and total payroll of $19.9 billion.

Colorado and its constituent communities regularly rank at or near the top in a multitude of rankings for prowess in technology and innovation.

Those trends and more are why the Colorado Technology Association teamed with BizWest Media LLC — publisher of BizWest, a biweekly business journal covering Boulder, Broomfield, Larimer and Weld counties — to produce this second edition of Colorado Tech. This publication highlights the industries and trends that constitute the state's technology scene, including listings of more than 2,500 of the state's tech-based companies.

With this edition, we've added more companies in the Colorado Springs region, as well as a smattering of others from outside the Front Range. That builds on the wealth of listings from the Denver metropolitan area — including the Boulder Valley — and Northern Colorado.

As with any research project, Colorado Tech is a work in progress. If we missed your company, or if your listing is incorrect, please visit www.coloradotech.biz to submit your correct data.

And we especially thank the more than 2,500 companies that responded to our survey and submitted their data — 500 more than last year!

We hope you enjoy this second edition of Colorado Tech. Let us know how we did!

We are Universal Mind - Enhancing the Human Experience through Digital

Brett Cortese, President and CEO, Universal Mind

Fifteen years ago, Brett Cortese found himself in a quandary. Working for a tech consulting firm, his employer folded the company. Brett was on-site helping his client when he received the news and faced a choice - pack it up and find another job, or stay on his own and fulfill the commitments made by his employer to his client. Unwilling to let down the client, Brett chose to stay and finish the work his former employer had started. And thus, Universal Mind was born.

Over the last 15 years, Brett has witnessed the digital landscape change dramatically. He's had front row seats to the death of Flex and Flash, the rise of the web, and the birth of mobility. He's witnessed others in our industry fade away, be acquired, and fall into irrelevancy. All the while, Brett has kept his eyes forward, surveying the future and sharpening the skills of Universal Mind.

Two years ago, eyes sharply pointed on the future, Brett saw an opportunity for Universal Mind to be a part of a conversation he knew was developing around organizational challenges. Digital Transformation was in its infancy, at the time only a vague concept, but the signs were clear to Brett. This was going to be a big deal with major ramifications.

Fast forward to today, and the industry is starting to see the writing on the wall -- companies are finding themselves ill-equipped to handle their inevitable transformation to digital. Organizations are silo'd and initiatives are mired in command / control / waterfall processes. It's a mess. Companies that weren't born as digital organizations are finding themselves directly in the cross-hairs of companies that are. They have a choice - either adapt and become digitally savvy or be usurped by faster moving, visionary organizations led by lean, agile and customer-centric forces.

With Brett at the helm, this is where Universal Mind's expertise comes into play. Brett understands the landscape. He has transformed organizations. He can see both the forest AND the trees and strategizes a plan that is value driven, actionable and proven to succeed.

Brett's spirit of human-centered technology that started with just himself, a chip and a chair, is alive in all of us at Universal Mind today. Together, we help people and organizations to achieve their ideal state in a complex and ever changing digital world. We enhance the human experience through digital. We are Universal Mind.

State builds on image as high-tech hub

BY PAULA AVEN GLADYCH
news@bizwestmedia.com

The days when Colorado was considered solely an energy economy are long gone. Now, the state is nationally known as a high-tech hub, with Boulder, Fort Collins, Colorado Springs and the Denver metro area all hosting high-tech industry clusters.

The top high-tech industries in the state are aerospace, aviation, beverage production, bioscience, broadcasting and telecommunications, energy, financial services, health care and wellness and information technology-software, according to the Metro Denver Economic Development Corp.'s 10th annual Industry Cluster Study.

All of the state's technology clusters, particularly software, IT, aerospace, aviation, financial services, clean energy and bioscience (both pharma and devices) are exploding again, said Tom Clark, chief executive of the MDEDC.

"We are highly encouraged with the momentum we see in our industry clusters," he said. "Colorado is certainly top of mind among site-selection consultants and expanding companies for its highly educated workforce and high-performance business climate. Targeting our marketing and recruitment efforts in these innovation clusters is the right strategy to drive our economic future."

Because of its diversity, Colorado's economy continues to grow, even in the wake of an energy industry slump that shuttered fracking operations across the state and caused many companies to sell their Colorado positions and close their local offices.

"What is interesting is that even though we had declines in mining and lodging, primarily oil and gas, these other industries are still growing. It proves that the momentum we had throughout our recovery was not just from oil and gas but across industries," said Laura Blomquist Rodriguez, senior manager of strategy and analytics for global business development, at the Colorado Office of Economic Development and International Trade.

Colorado ranked fourth in the nation for the number of high-tech industry startups in 2015, according to the Kauffman Index Startup Activity Ranking, and the Denver-Aurora-Broomfield metro area ranked No. 5 on the Kauffman Index out of 40 metropolitan areas.

Why would large technology companies move to the nine-county Denver metro area over other parts of the country, and what makes it a haven for startup tech companies and entrepreneurs?

Blomquist Rodriguez pointed out that the state has the second-most highly educated workforce in the nation behind only Massachusetts, which makes it very attractive to high-tech companies. The average annual wage in Colorado's high-tech sector in 2015 was $76,260, "which is higher than the statewide average for all jobs," she said.

OEDIT recently surveyed startups in the state to see how they benefited from being in this community and to determine the costs and other hurdles they face in the state.

"What they get from being here far outweighs the cost," Blomquist Rodriguez said. Networking opportunities for startups was the top reason businesses were satisfied with their decision to launch in Colorado. Surprisingly, access to funding and a talented workforce were not as important to those surveyed as were the networking opportunities.

"That is why they choose these areas, in addition to the local atmosphere. That's not just arts and entertainment or bars and breweries, it is an openness to new ideas," she said. "That's what separates Colorado from other areas."

Clark said he believes the ability to attract talent to Colorado is the driving force behind the state's growth as a high-tech hub.

"The wonderful thing about technology is it is not like steel," he said, noting that in the late 1800s, when the United States first became an industrial nation, thousands of people knew how to make steel but only a handful could get the money together to commercially produce it.

With advances in technology, innovation can come in the form of a $500 laptop computer and an internet connection, he said.

OEDIT's June forecast showed that high-tech activity in the state is an "important driver of our economy, both now and in the future." Much of the high-tech growth in the state is "being driven by an emergence of mobile devices, social media, cloud com-

Broomfield-based Level 3 Communications is an $8 billion global telecom company, serving 60 countries worldwide. It has 10 million fiber miles and 50,000 global customers.

Telecom firms thrive in a Rocky Mountain high

BY PAULA AVEN GLADYCH

Level 3 Communications started out small, spinning off from an Omaha, Neb.-based construction company in 1998.

Back then, it was installing fiber optics for other telecommunication companies. Today, it is an $8 billion global telecom company, serving 60 countries worldwide. It has 10 million fiber miles and 50,000 global customers — and is just one of the major broadcasting and telecommunications companies that calls Colorado home.

So why did it choose Broomfield as its home base?

"When we got into this high-tech game, Colorado was of interest to us," said Tracy Shaufler, Level 3's general manager for Colorado and Wyoming. The company searched for the perfect location to build its headquarters, vetting big-name tech cities such as San Jose and Boston before settling on Broomfield. It ended up choosing the state because of its high quality of life and the ability to recruit top talent, she said.

A lot of high-tech companies migrate to Colorado because it has a large talent pool of engineers and innovative thinkers, she added.

Tom Clark, chief executive of the Metro Denver Economic Development Corp., said consolidation in the telecommunications industry helped create jobs in Colorado. According to Metro Denver EDC, there are 41,970 broadcasting and telecommunications workers in the nine-county region, which is the sixth-highest employment concentration out of the 50 largest metropolitan areas. It is also the largest region in the nation to offer "one-bounce satellite uplinks due to its unique geographic location in the Mountain Time Zone," according to the EDC.

About 2,560 broadcasting and telecommunications companies call Colorado home, with an average wage of $106,060 a year.

Telecom companies come to the Denver metro area for its central location, large concentration of high-tech workers and entrepreneurs, a lower cost of doing business and a pro-business environment and competitive tax structure, according to the EDC.

Zayo Group, DISH Network, Liberty Media, Cisco Systems, DirecTV and Comcast are just a few of the big names in broadcasting and telecommunications that have a regional presence.

"There's no place anywhere in the West where you can get this incredible volume of product through all the pipes as you can here in Denver," Clark said. "All of the major fiber optic comes through Denver. There's no place else it is going to go. Not through Casper or Albuquerque. That's a huge asset to us."

He pointed out that Level 3 was a startup when it arrived in Denver and now it is a Fortune 500 company.

"It was created to do one thing — that was to deal with the problem of how much pictures were slowing down the internet in the late '80s and early '90s, and damned if they didn't stay around to be a Fortune 500 company," Clark said. "They were here for the pipes and then they built their own pipes. They build their own network out, which they have done very successfully.

"The biggest driver for us is the tech environment. There are some really sharp folks interested in doing business in Colorado," Shaufler said. "Some of the savviest companies sit here in Colorado so the employment base is very strong for us."

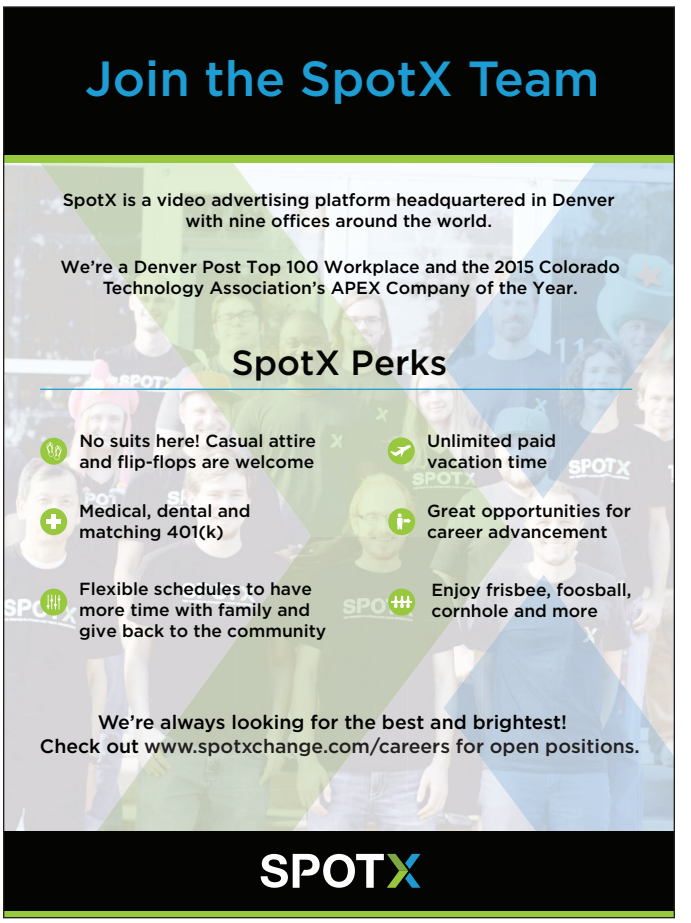

She added that Level 3 has many great partnerships in technology in Colorado, and new companies are popping up all the time.

"We think this is just the beginning of a very big time of growth for Level 3," she said. There is a constant demand for bandwidth because "everything is connected to the internet at this time."

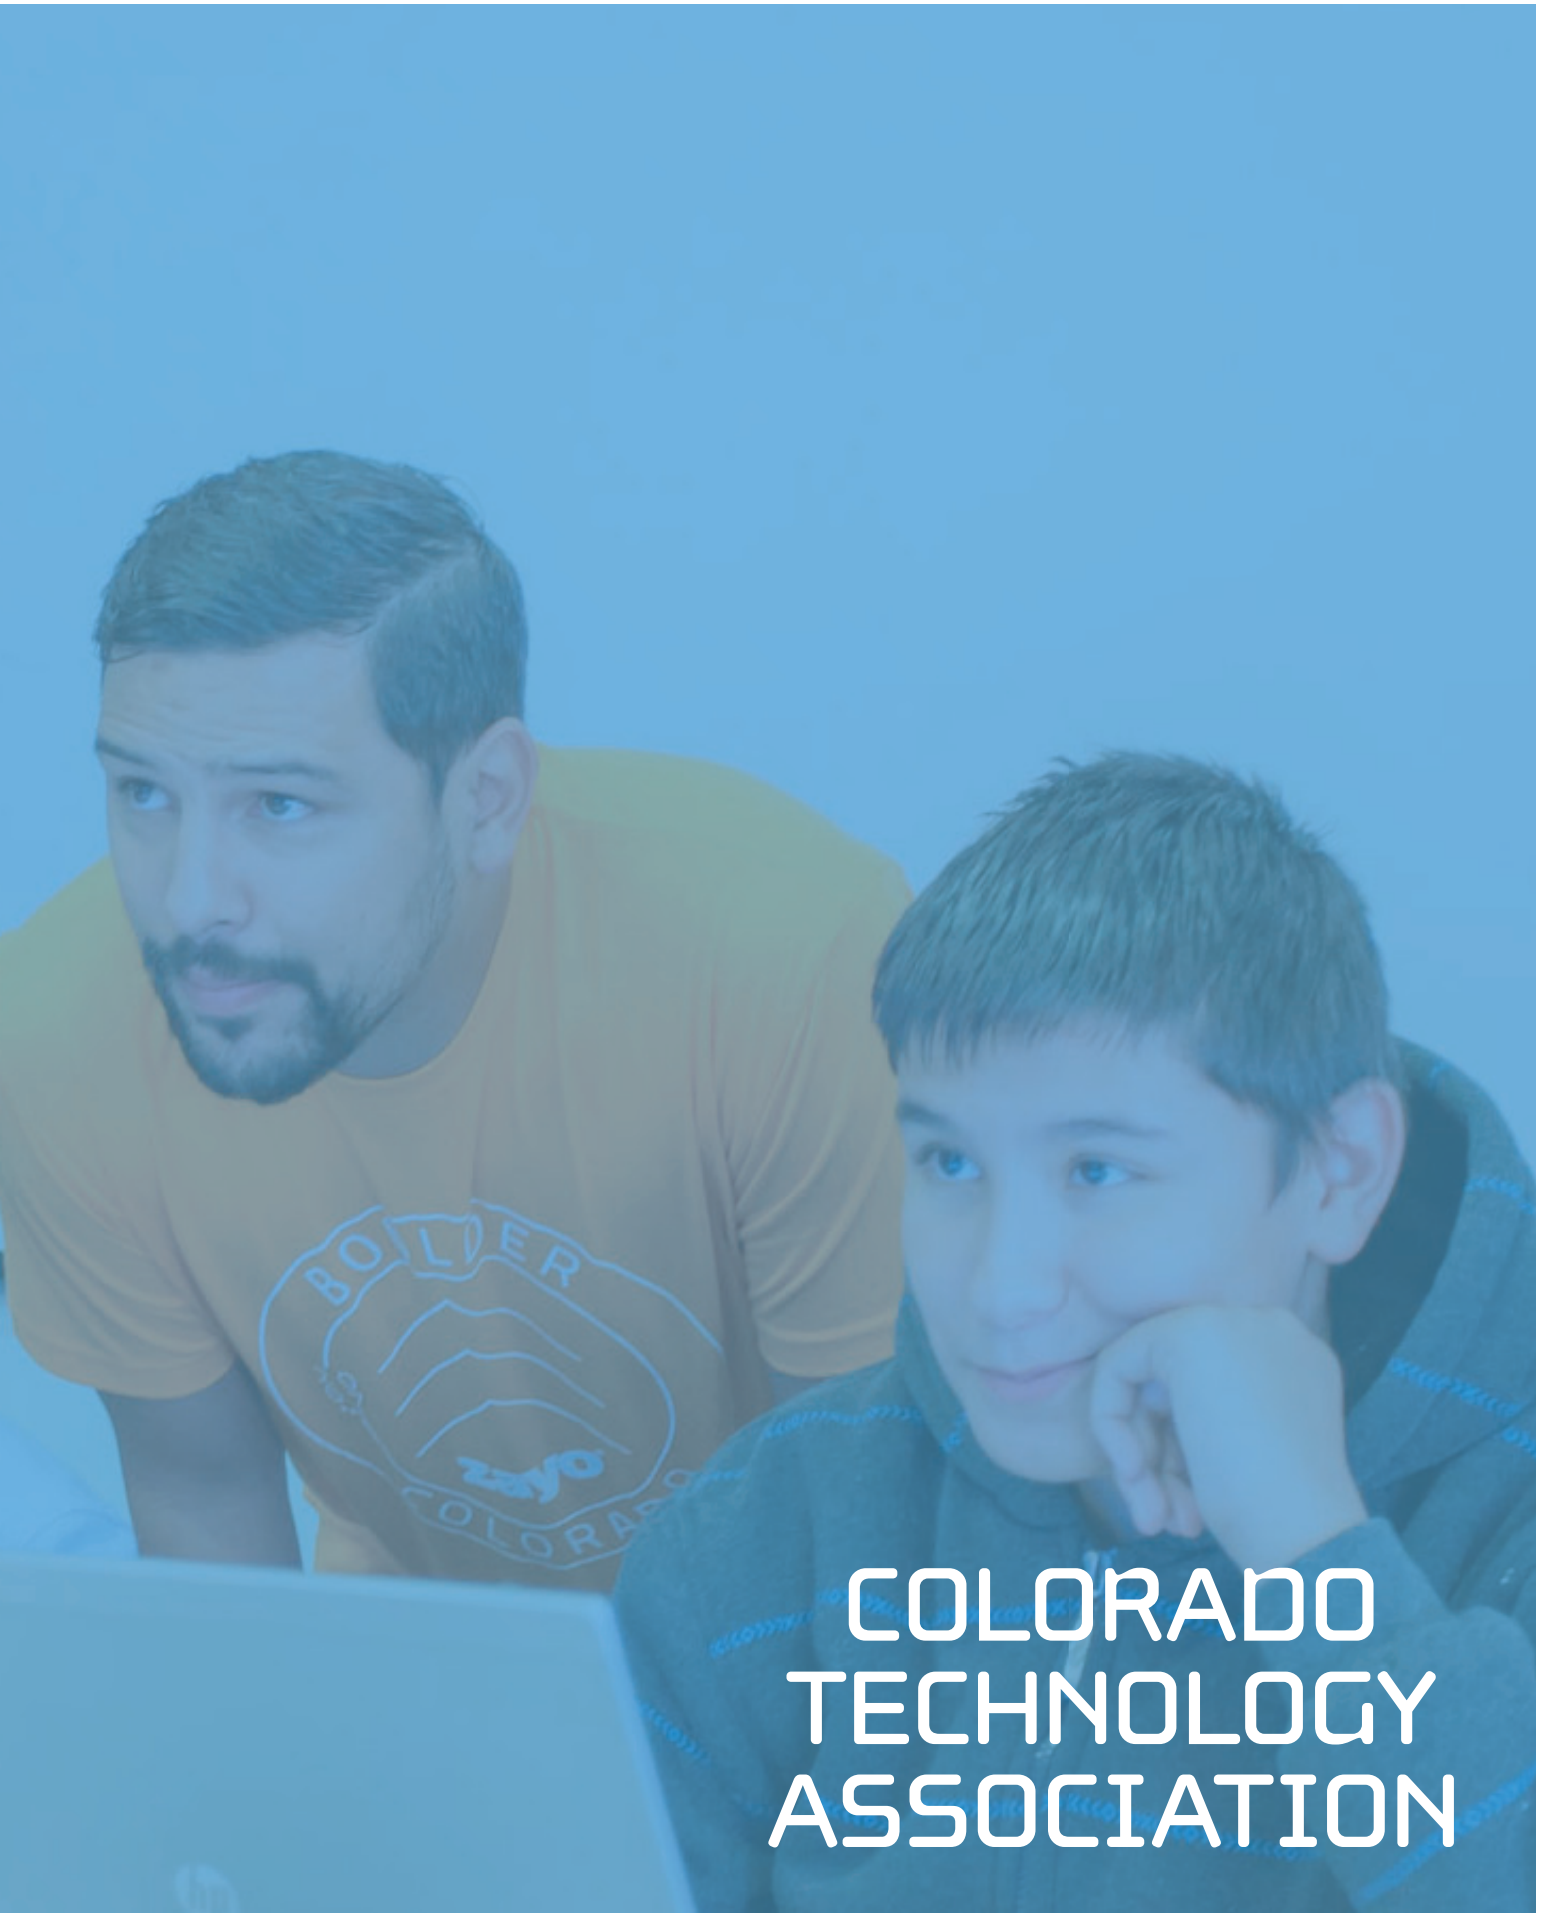

Level 3 continues to diversify its offerings. Shaufler said her company is interested in a broader portfolio across several different disciplines, including

The Catalyst Campus, in a converted railroad station just east of downtown Colorado Springs, provides the tools and partners for industry leaders to excel, entrepreneurs to create and students to learn.

COURTESY CATALYST CAMPUS

New Springs center a catalyst for startups

BY JEFF THOMAS
news@bizwestmedia.com

The opening of the Catalyst Center in Colorado Springs last month raised some eyebrows in the startup community across the state, although by most measures Boulder still remains the envy of most of the nation in this regard.

The Springs campus, a string of three buildings near downtown, is anchored by the remodeled Sante Fe Railroad station and features about 100,000 square feet of communal workspace, commercial offices, executive suites and research and development facilities focused on the startup community. When it opened in mid-June, it already had attracted more than a dozen small startup companies, and is housing a publicly funded endeavor to assist the transition of manufacturing companies called FourFront Fuse Impact Center.

Colorado Springs Mayor John Suthers said the center will help attract new startups to his city, but also is an indicator of a transition already occurring in a city historically known for its defense-industry companies.

"It's a great place, and the kind of thing you'd see in Boston and other cities known for their support of the tech industry," said Suthers about the remodeling of the early 20th-century train station, one of three buildings included in the campus. However, Suthers — who served as Colorado attorney general from 2005 to 2015 — noted that an economic transition in the Springs is already under way.

"For the first 15 years of this century, we were creating maybe 3,000 jobs a year (in El Paso county). We weren't seeing the increase that other parts of the state were seeing in the energy sector and tech fields," he said. "But things have really taken off in the last year, as we created 9,000 new jobs."

The center communal space includes conference rooms highlighted by extremely large high-definition screens allowing for virtual conferencing and data sharing at high speeds via internet connections supplied by Comcast. The partners in the Catalyst Center are based around the O'Neil Group and its recently acquired Braxton Technologies, which has expertise and products in command and control, satellite ground systems, software development and systems engineering.

Suthers said the group's chief executive, Kevin O'Neil, had an early career in real estate, although the group's focus is now company acquisition, and was able to garner some concessions in development, including a partnership with Comcast to provide high-speed internet. With $1.5 million in matching funds, the partners also received a $750,000 grant from the Colorado Economic Development Commission to create the 10,000-square-foot Cyber and Space Operations Center, which Braxton will use to complete two Small Business Innovation Research contracts awarded by the Air Force Research Laboratory.

As with Boulder County, the No. 1 job opening in the Springs, which encompasses about two thirds of the entire county, is for software engineers, Suthers said. Cyber security is a growing concern here, along with a growing aerospace industry that the area historically has supported.

One area that is a concern in the Springs is a decline in the manufacturing needs of military contractors, a reason that ForeFront Fuse has located here to serve all of southern Colorado. The Colorado Advanced Manufacturing Alliance oversees implementation of a $6.6 million grant from the Department of Defense to establish advancement centers intended to help defense companies and manufacturers grow, advance and diversify into new markets, and poured $1 million of that into ForeFront Fuse's headquarters at Catalyst Center for the first two years of programming and funding.

Director Jahr Turchan said his ForeFront Fuse center, one of four that will be established across the state, hosts programs, seminars and training, as well as providing manufacturing companies access to funding.

"My mission and daily goal is to reach out to as many manufacturing companies I can, to find what are their pain points and barriers to growth," Turchan said. "Through our ForeFront Center, they can avail themselves to $15,000 worth of funding to assist in manufacturing transition."

Turchan said locating at the Catalyst Center was a natural, as all the ForeFront locations will seek to ally themselves with strategic partners. In Loveland, he noted, the ForeFront location at the Rocky Mountain Center for Innovation & Technology will benefit by the fact that EWI, whose missions in Colorado is to assist companies to move from research and development to manufacturing, is located in the same facility.

But are the economic development types in Boulder worried about the rise of startups in Colorado Springs? Hardly, said Clif Harald, executive director of the Boulder Economic Council.

"I think 'the more, the better,' and I hope they are outrageously successful," Harald said. "It's not really a competitive thing. It's a complex economic ecosystem that supports startups. More like 'a rising tide raises all boats.' "

Boulder also has a diversified number of such communal workspaces and incubators including TechStars, university-funded coworking space and privately funded endeavors.

Harald said that a recent study by the Kauffman Center found that the Boulder areas was rated No. 1 in the world in startup density (somewhat akin to startups per capita), and had twice the density as the No. 2 location, Silicon Valley.

"About a third of all the venture capital in Colorado (or a quarter billion dollars annually) comes into Boulder," he said. "There's a value system that's obvious in Boulder and Denver and Longmont. A value system of paying it forward: The successful entrepreneur supporting the next generation of startups."

Arrow Electronics Inc. signed an agreement to acquire the online electronic design publications of UBM and last year acquired United Technical Publishing, a division of Hearst Business Media.

CHRIS WOOD/BIZWEST

Electronics firm: EE Times to stay straight as an Arrow

BY JEFF THOMAS
news@bizwestmedia.com

When a Fortune 150 company has been around for more than 80 years, you can bet it has seen its share of major product changes, along with raising a few eyebrows along the way.

So it appeared to be last month with Arrow Electronics Inc., when it announced the signing of an agreement to acquire the online electronic design publications of UBM, including EE Times, EDN, ESM, Embedded, EBN, TechONline, and Datasheets.com. Last year, Arrow acquired United Technical Publishing, a division of Hearst Business Media and a leading digital provider of product information to the global electronics components industry.

The moves definitely raised some eyebrows in the technical publishing fields, including those of Electronics Weekly, which pointed out that a major distributor of processor components and accessories was purchasing a chief competitor at the forefront of providing independent review of electronic engineering solutions, particularly in applications dealing with processors and microcontrollers. Locally, the move also caused some concerns among the electronic engineering crowd about whether EE Times would continue to be the completely independent voice it had been for decades.

"Absolutely, the intent is to keep the editorial arm independent," said John Hourigan, vice president for global communications. While noting that the UBM sale is still subject to normal regulatory approval, Hourigan said that Arrow fully appreciates that changing the editorial policies of the acquired media assets would be a mistake, and the company is establishing an independent publishing arm of the company to make sure there is editorial separation.

"That was done with the publications of United Technical publishing," Hourigan said. "We're working to keep the editorial voice of those publications independent."

Still, for those of us outside of the electronic engineering field, it is difficult to appreciate the stature of EE Times. While the content of other publications, including some of UBM's holdings, tend to fall in line with the products being advertised, EE Times has been an extremely independent voice, advocating new processes long before they became widely accepted and questioning some that were largely accepted.

In other words, it would be somewhat similar to ExxonMobil buying The New York Times.

"I've been a reader of EE Times since it was distributed in print 25 years ago," said Scott Hoot, a former AMD engineer and chief executive of Sage Electronic Engineering, an open-source bootloading solution for AMD and Intel processors.

'Absolutely, the intent is to keep the editorial arm independent,"

John Hourigan, vice president for global communications

"Definitely Arrow is a great company and distributor, with its fingers in lots of the development pieces today. But I actually find it concerning, having the industry commentary bought up with someone with a vested interest in setting the directions of the industry," said Hoot. a Longmont resident whose new startup, Zfyre, is a cloud-storage solution.

Arrow is headquartered in Centennial and employs about 1,700 people in Colorado and 18,500 in 640 locations in 85 countries. Historically, Arrow is a very interesting company, a mirror of what was transpiring in the industry as a whole.

The company was founded in 1935 as Arrow Radio, a retail store selling used parts for radios that opened in the heart of lower Manhattan's "Radio Row," known as the birthplace of electronics distribution.

Moving into new radios in the 1940s, the company found its true nature by gaining the franchise rights to sell parts for major radio brands, and was renamed Arrow Electronics in 1946. In the '50s, Arrow began selling electronic parts to industrial customers, and went public in 1961, listing total sales of $4 million, more than half coming from industrial sales.

In the 1970s, the company really showed its progressive thinking, gaining key semiconductor franchises, including Texas Instruments. That thinking led Arrow to become the country's second largest electronics distributor by 1980.

Arrow now lists annual sales of $23 billion and may be on the verge of yet puting and internet search engines."

Boulder is the "R&D center of the metro region and even the Rocky Mountain region," said Clark. "So much innovation comes out of there and so much of it is spread throughout the region because the citizens of Boulder want a compact urban village."

Organizations such as Techstars, which helps entrepreneurs bring their ideas to fruition, and Startup Colorado, which is a regional initiative to increase the breadth and depth of the entrepreneurial ecosystem across the Front Range, have helped put the metro area on the map. There are numerous opportunities for entrepreneurs and highly skilled workers to network and share ideas across the state. All of that has made the area very attractive for new businesses.

Information technology software is a "hotbed of innovation activity, fueled by a talented IT workforce, modern infrastructure and an entrepreneurial spirit," according to MDEDC's industry cluster report. Colorado ranked third in the country for its number of high-tech workers per capita, according to the report. It employed 48,610 IT workers at 4,810 companies throughout the nine-county region in 2015.

Colorado also has become known for its clean-energy research, much of it driven by the major universities along the Front Range and the National Renewable Energy Laboratory in Golden. The industry employed 54,720 people at 3,140 companies in 2015.

Financial Services was the second-fastest growing industry in the region in 2015.

"We've always been a financial center simply because there is nobody else around to compete with us, except Salt Lake City," Clark said.

Large financial companies such as Charles Schwab, Fidelity and TIAA-CREF have a huge presence in the state, spurring a need for new financial technologies and services. Much of the financial services growth is a result of startups that have come to the state to help the banks, investment companies and insurance companies improve how they disseminate information.

Medical device manufacturing continues to grow in the state, particularly in the southeast corridor, Clark said. Even though growth in Colorado's broadcasting and telecommunications industry slowed slightly last year, some of the biggest players still have a major presence in the state, including Level 3 Communications, Comcast and Zayo Group.

In 2015, San Jose, Calif., continued to have the largest concentration of high-tech companies, with 21.4 percent of its workers in high-tech occupations. In comparison, Boulder had 15.6 percent of its workforce in high-tech jobs, followed by the Fort Collins-Loveland area with 9.3 percent, Colorado Springs with 9.1 percent and Denver-Aurora with 8.3 percent. Statewide, 7.9 percent of the workforce is in high-tech jobs, according to the Colorado Department of Labor and Employment and the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics.

After the energy industry crash of the '80s, Colorado made a major push to diversify its economy.

"Here we are 30 years later and we are the third or fourth most diverse economy in the U.S.," Clark said. "We weren't in the top 25 in 1983."

security and ethernet.

Shaufler believes that telecom will continue to be a fairly competitive industry to be in and Colorado will continue to be a telecom and broadcasting hub.

"For us, we see Denver as being a second Silicon Valley. Folks are done with that environment. They like getting out to our lifestyle, the opportunities we have in our state to really enjoy a better work life balance," she said. Add to that the state's technology incubators in Boulder and Denver, and prospective companies realize there is a great appreciation for innovation in this state.

In terms of competition, Shaufler said "there's lots of reasons why having multiple carriers in the marketplace makes sense. Level 3 is uniquely positioned to be a standout market leader."

Boulder-based Zayo Group Holdings, Inc. is another Colorado telecom success story. The company, which was founded in 2007, noticed "dozens of fiber orphans — companies that had fiber in isolated markets — were being ignored by private equity investors and strategic acquirers," said Matt Erickson, co-chief operating officer of Zayo in May. "Our strategy was to consolidate them into a new type of telecom provider — one focused on providing communications infrastructure to content, cloud, big data and wireless carriers."

Zayo expects to grow 20 percent each year for the next three years. The company, which went public in 2014, has surpassed $1.4 billion in annual revenue. Its fiber footprint exceeds 110,000 route miles and extends to more than 35 countries.

In 2015, Comcast opened a new office in downtown Denver, very close to Union Station, employing about 200 employees.

Matt McConnell, senior vice president of Comcast Wholesale, said last year that the Denver office "provides a state-of-the-art environment where our employees can collaborate and develop services that empower our customers to navigate the digital world. The workspace offers the latest technology, dynamic workstations and a design that fosters a spirit of innovation."

In May, Comcast announced plans to open a Fort Collins customer service center, which will employ about 600 employees, and in June the company announced it would move 1,000 employees to a new location in Centennial.

Despite consolidation in telecom and broadcasting over the past few years and that the jobs provided in the area keep changing, Clark said, a lot of innovation out there will change how jobs are done. Using agriculture as an example, he said, in the early 1900s, 40 percent of Americans were engaged in farming.

"Farming is the most productive industry in the United States and getting better," he said. Satellite-driven tractors and other innovations have cut down on the number of laborers needed to produce food. On the other hand, the food-service business is booming.

"The diversification of what we eat and how it is prepared and how it is delivered, there is massive growth in those," he said. "That's what we look at when it comes to the Comcasts of the world. Those jobs will get smaller. We will do more programming of our sets like they do on Xfinity right now."

Instead, the industry will continue to move and evolve in other directions to keep up with technological innovations — which will, in turn, create new jobs.

Are You Ready for the All Flash Data Center?

There's a good chance you are planning the transition to flash storage. But migrating to an all flash data center has its challenges.

Learn about the top six obstacles that can slow your adoption of all flash technology in the new eBook, "Overcoming the Obstacles to the All Flash Data Center."

This eBook provides tips on how to:
- Overcome the adoption cost barriers
- Protect your long-term investment
- Manage the transition without disruption

another corporate leap, as the Internet of Things and cloud-storage world begins to unfold. Arrow distributes all kinds of processors, from the super-fast, multi-core processors powering servers, computers and mobile products to the smaller, slower processors, usually known as microcontrollers, that can be found in products such as coffee makers, refrigerators and thermostats.

Coupling communication solutions between computers and microcontrollers — which may just be relaying data on something as simple as temperature, winds and humidity — is exactly what the IoT is all about. So while the profit margin on all types of processors has been slipping lately, Arrow sells all the components to make these solutions happen, including the engineering designs.

Hourigan said buying the publication assets was not about the editorial side of the industry. Instead, it was gaining access to the engineering data that flows through these websites.

"There wouldn't be any value of the acquisition of these assets if the editorial independence wasn't maintained," he said. "But both (the UBM and United Technical asset) have engineering websites and databases. You have to look at the entire portfolio."

The data that can be gleaned from these sites, Hourigan said, will help shape corporate decisions that will pay dividends five to 10 years down the road. The company isn't simply seeking email addresses to dump into a CMS, it is trying to determine what types of engineering solutions are needed by up-and-coming customers.

"This is a step forward in our digital transformation, positioning Arrow as the pre-eminent, unbiased technology internet media, design, and eCommerce option for companies, from those on Indiegogo all the way to Fortune 500 global leaders," said Matt Anderson, chief digital officer of Arrow Electronics, in a prepared statement.

Hoot said he understands Arrow's intent to be ahead of the curve in providing solutions, but as Arrow and Avnet control more and more of the market in providing both the components and the engineering solutions, there still will be a loss of independent review.

"What happens is the duplication of bad ideas, bad code and bad practices," said Hoot, who has provided engineering design for more than 300 different computer boards. "These are the kinds of things that led to the OpenSSL and Heartbleed bugs."
