Industry expansion continues in NoCo

Next month, UCHHealth will open the newest addition to its lineup of hospitals and clinics with the opening of the UCHHealth Greeley Hospital. The hospital, under construction for more than a year, is hoped to relieve pressure on other UCHHealth facilities — not to mention Banner Health facilities — in the region.

Instead of holding patients in emergency rooms as hospitals wait for beds to open up, the new hospital may be able to take some of the load.

Health care continues to undergo a dramatic transformation nationwide, including in Northern Colorado, where new clinics, merged clinics, satellite offices and more seem to occur weekly.

And there's more to come. The Veterans Administration, with a clinic in Fort Collins, is scouting locations for an expanded operation in Northern Colorado.

Larimer County has begun to plan for a new mental health facility, which resulted from passage of a mental health tax last year. When complete, the mental health facility will specialize in all manner of mental health issues, including drug and alcohol abuse and misuse.

The Health District of Northern Larimer County, along with partner agencies, is working to combat opioid abuse and to help the public understand how addiction happens and how it can be combated.

Banner Health has launched a new program at the North Colorado Medical Center in Greeley to begin to build a database of information about health conditions of people in the region. Called All of Us, eventually Northern Colorado data will be added to data being collected at medical centers around the country to provide researchers with information they need to find new cures for diseases and improved methods of treating segments of the population underrepresented in existing research.

This edition of Northern Colorado MD captures a lot of the change that is happening, with updated listings on newly acquired practices, as well as other existing facilities and providers. This publication features almost 1,100 health-care facilities in Larimer and Weld counties, along with more than 2,100 listings for practitioners. Readers can use this directory to identify a physician in any of dozens of categories, learn about their educational background, obtain contact information and much more.

Compiling a directory such as this requires many hours of work. We're grateful to the major medical systems, facilities and physicians who submitted their data.

Please let us know of any glaring omissions or errors, and we'll be sure to correct the data online, and in our next print edition.

Finally, we're grateful to our sponsors, including Banner Health, Clear View Behavioral Health, COPIC, Kaiser Permanente and Surgery Center of Fort Collins for making this publication possible!

Brain Pods have been placed around northern Larimer County as part of a changing minds campaign. Just like drug addiction changes the mind of the addict, the campaign hopes to change minds of people about how addiction needs to be tackled.

Changing Minds campaign aims to change views on addiction

By Shelley Widhalm

If you see a freestanding glowing display of an oversized brain, you might learn some facts about addiction — and change your mind about how you view those with substance use disorders and who live with the disease of addiction.

The Health District of Northern Larimer County, in conjunction with the Larimer County Mental Health and Substance Use Alliance, MHSU, offers the Changing Minds Brain Pod as part of a campaign to raise public awareness about drug and alcohol addiction in Northern Colorado. The aim of the Changing Minds campaign is to de-stigmatize the disease, break down barriers to care and offer a connection to resources.

“Addiction changes people’s brains, and we want to change people’s minds about addiction,” said Lin Wilder, director of community impact at the Health District of Northern Larimer County. “We want them to think differently about it and approach it differently. We want to change the narrative of addiction.”

One in 10 or 26,000 Larimer County residents live with drug and/or alcohol addiction, though less than one in 10 receive addiction treatment, leaving 23,600 in need of care, according to statistics compiled by the Health District.

Every dollar invested in addiction treatment yields a return of $4-12 by reducing the unnecessary and costly use of the emergency room, hospitals and criminal justice service, Wilder said.

“There are a lot of reasons people don’t get the treatment they need,” Wilder said. “There is a lot of stigma out there and misperceptions around addiction. We want to change that by bringing information about the brain science of addiction.”

Launched in August 2018, Changing Minds is an at least three-year campaign focused on raising awareness about addiction as a chronic disorder of the brain to reduce that stigma, while also offering information on using non-stigmatizing language.

“A part of what is essential is battling the stigma that people with mental health and substance use difficulties experience, which create barriers to getting help,” said Anne Hudgens, chairwoman of the MHSU Alliance. “This is particularly true related to substance use. There is a great deal of new and emerging brain science that offers a much clearer biological picture of what happens for people experiencing difficulty with substance use. ... Our goal is to have people learn about what happens to the brain in order to change judgments people hold and increase the opportunities for successful treatment.”

Addiction is a chronic, life-threatening disease that changes the wiring of the brain, so that when addiction takes hold, the brain is rewired to function as if drugs and/or alcohol are not a choice but essential for survival. Through evidence-based medical treatment, dopamine levels can be stabilized and cravings reduced. Addiction care that includes medication, counseling and ongoing recovery support can be as effective as treatments for other diseases and help improve remission and recovery rates.

The Changing Minds campaign is funded through the Health District and the MHSU Alliance, a nonprofit consisting of more than 20 organizations and consumer and family representatives working together since 1999 to help improve health care in the community.

“We developed the campaign with the hopes of reaching all different perspectives and opinions about addiction by creating messaging that speaks to the personal impact it has through recovery stories, the economic costs of addiction and not treating it effectively, and the overall prevalence and impact on our community,” said Brian Ferrans, manager of behavioral health strategy and implementation for the Health District’s community impact team, in an email statement.

The campaign has four main components, including an informational website and social media posts, presentations, videos, and public installations of the Brain Pods. The Health District and the MHSU Alliance provide staff time to implement those components.

Five staff members on the Health District’s community impact team are providing the presentations throughout Larimer County at places like community organizations, clubs, churches and lunch and learn programs, tailoring them to the needs of the requesting group. The Health District also trains members of the MHSU Alliance to provide the presentations for their own organizations.

Staff and alliance members offer an option of 20-, 30- or 60-minute presentations and encourage discussion about a number of topics related to substance use disorders and addiction. Key topics of the presentations include an explanation of how addiction changes the brain, an understanding of how cravings impact behavior, and a look at the impact addiction has on society, as well as the treatments that work and some ways to improve treatment.

“What we generally see when we do this presentation is people’s jaws drop,” Wilder said. “The information we’re providing is kind of a shocker for a lot of people.”

Another component of the campaign is to start conversations about addiction and treatment through the Brain Pods, which dispense cards with facts about addiction and fun facts. The pods, which made their debut in August 2018 at New West Fest in Fort Collins, are brought to different locations in Northern Colorado as a traveling exhibit, or organizations can sponsor them at their own locations.

“It’s kind of an attention getter to interact with people,” Wilder said. “They’ll understand things in a whole different way ... and have a lot more compassion for people with the condition. They’ll understand different ways of thinking about it than they have for a very long time.”

Two other components of the campaign include a website and social media campaign and a series of training videos geared toward health care providers. The videos are available to medical practitioners and counselors to show to their patients and patient families. The idea is to help them better understand addiction and how the first use of a substance is a choice but that addiction is not a choice.

The website and social media campaign include short videos of stories of addiction and recovery and provides messaging to increase understanding of substance use and reduce the stigma. So far, ChangingMindsLarimer.org has three stories posted and is seeking additional stories.

“Telling these stories helps people understand that folks with addiction are like everyone else,” Wilder said.

Larimer begins work using mental health tax

By Jeff Thomas

news@bizwest.com

Larimer County voters taxed themselves to bring in the new Mental Health Matters Program; now it's time for the program to show them it can not only save lives but also save money in the long run, according to the director of the county's Behavioral Health Services.

"We should not just assume that taxpayers will continue to fund this after 20 years," said Director Laurie Stolen. "I think it's our responsibility" to attempt to make the program self-funding when the tax sunsets, she said.

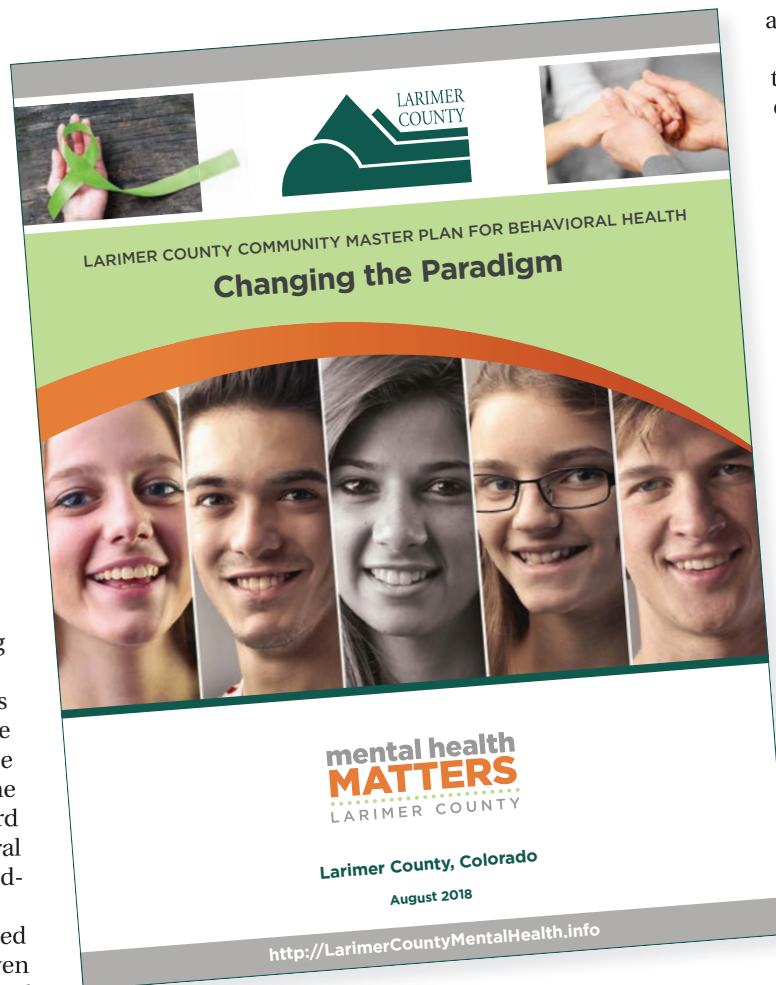

If it sounds as if Stolen has a big project in front of her, she does.

The county's 0.25 percent sales and use tax is expected to generate some $15.4 million in this, the first year. A large majority of the proceeds will necessarily go toward capital costs for a 64-bed behavioral health facility slated to open in mid-2021.

However, the program is designed to begin delivering results even before it has a building. Stolen said the county has already earmarked $1 million for distributed funding to communities. Stolen said the funds are not available yet, as her department is creating a funding application and a scoring matrix for evaluation.

Essentially, the program is looking to create partners in the communities to address concerns in those individual communities. A policy advisory council with elected representatives from Larimer County's eight municipalities will decide which services to fund based on the gaps in each community.

Berthoud's representative, Mayor Will

Karspeck, said the advisory committee has already met four times, and he thought all of the committee members were focused on filling in the gaps for the entire county, rather than just focusing on their own needs.

"We're still working out how those funds might look like, whether it might be a block funding or if we could allow pilot projects," Karspeck said. "Right now it's all very preliminary, but I think everyone is not looking at just our town perspective, but as a region. The rural (population) and smaller communities also need attention.

Karspeck also said that he's paying a lot of attention to mental health specialists and where they might see the most significant gaps. "Once we get more of an idea what non-profits might be eligible, I'm hoping they will be reaching out to me, and I'll certainly be reaching out to people."

The county released a request for proposals for designing and building the treatment center in mid-May, the cost of which has been estimated at $28 million, Stolen said. The bulk of the tax proceeds will go toward building the center, so at least two years of the tax funding will go to that purpose.

"We're hoping for '21 or early '22 (for completion of the center)," she said. The building site between Loveland and Fort Collins on South Taft Hill and Trilby Road is owned by the county, which will own the building and lease it to a service provider.

The facility itself will have six different levels of care, Stolen said, including medical triage, mental health assessment, walk-in crises for all ages and crisis stabilization. The hospital is designed as a short-term residential hospital, which usually denotes stays of about 12 days, but patients could stay up to 30 days. There will be three levels of detox at the facility, which includes social and medical monitoring.

“The annual budget for operations of the facility will be around $15 million, but about $5 million of that will be recapturable (for instance, from insurance),” Stolen said. “So there will be actual operational costs of around $11 million.”

“Our goal is to braid funding as best as we can, by bringing partners on board, with a goal of trying to find sustainable funding,” she said. But the larger savings, she said, could be in decreasing return visits and reducing crisis management.

“We want to make sure we are utilizing our system smarter than we are now,” Stolen said. “The real task of the treatment center is bringing new partners into mental health treatment.”

Once the treatment center is operational the county hopes that between $4 million and $6 million will be available for bridge funding. Essentially, these funds will be used for people who can’t afford treatment, need treatment in their own community, or even need transportation to treatment.

“That’s what makes this project unique, and I think it is what will make it successful,” Stolen said. “We want to decrease the cost of long-term care, by getting access to intervention to the underinsured or not insured. We want to eliminate all the things that keep people from recovery and stability.”

Program supporters point out that the center and its programs can translate into savings for taxpayers by reducing the number of people with mental or behavioral health issue who are housed in county jail; or on a more societal level, reducing uninsured emergency room use.

Stolen previously worked on a similar county program, Alternatives to Incarceration for Individuals with Mental Health Needs, which showed success in reducing jail bed days. However, she said getting to people before they encounter legal problems could be even more effective.

Mental health experts say that every $1 spent on substance use treatment yields $4 to $7 in economic benefits such as

Laurie Stolen, Larimer County

reduced criminal justice costs. However, Stolen is well aware that the economic benefits don’t translate into recoverable costs to the program.

“We have got to be accountable to the taxpayers,” she said about the 20-year funding sunset. “At least we have got to be able to explain why we didn’t get there when that rolls around.”

Opioid Prevention Work Group

takes multi-pronged approach to combat opioid crisis

By Shelley Widhalm

news@bizwest.com

Addressing the opioid crisis in Northern Colorado takes a multi-pronged approach of prevention, intervention, treatment and harm reduction — and also getting rid of the stigma associated with drug use and misuse.

The Northern Colorado Opioid Prevention Work Group formed in May 2017 as a community initiative to increase awareness about substance use disorders and addiction treatment and develop strategies to help both the health-care sector and larger community deal with the opioid issue.

The Work Group consists of a partnership of more than 35 organizations in Larimer and Weld counties organized by the Health District of Northern Larimer County, the North Colorado Health Alliance and SummitStone Health Partners, a nonprofit that provides mental health and addiction services in Fort Collins, Loveland and Estes Park.

“Ultimately, we want to improve lives and reduce or eliminate overdose,” said Cyndi Dodds, co-chairwoman of the Northern Colorado Opioid Prevention Work Group and chief clinical officer of SummitStone Health Partners. “Ultimately, we are looking at increasing access to treatment.”

Opioids are prescribed to treat pain or come in an illegal form like heroin. With pain treatment, they can lose their pain-relieving effects with prolonged use and cause the pain to worsen, and over time, dependence or addiction can result. Opioid use disorder as defined by the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 5th Edition, DSM-5, is “a problematic pattern of opioid use leading to clinically significant impairment or distress.”

In both Larimer and Weld counties, 5.9 percent of the population misuses opioids, representing 17,567 people in Larimer and 14,856 people in Weld. There is a gap in treatment, assuming treatment is being sought, of between 1,270 and 1,802 people in Larimer and 1,472 and 1,756 people in Weld.

To address that gap, the work group has four priority areas, which will be helped with the passage of the 1A ballot measure in 2018 to

new behavioral

t r e a t m e n t

f a c i l i t y ,

Dodds said.

treatment

the community and it will get better with the 1A ballot measure,” Dodds said.

The first priority area involves preventing the misuse and optimizing the use of opioids for appropriate pain management, such as prescribing minimum amounts for surgeries and considering alternative medications. Members of the work group visit physician practices and providers within the legal system and host community events to offer education on opioid use disorders and the best practices around prescribing medication and treating addiction.

The second priority focuses on identifying misuses of opioids and providing early intervention, while the third priority’s focus is on improving treatment and recovery for those with opioid use disorders.

“The two priorities go hand in hand,” Dodds said. “We can’t address priority two without offering treatment.”

The priorities target two main populations that include individuals with opioid use disorders connected to the criminal justice system, followed by those who are treated in the emergency room.

The work group received a 3-year, $1.5 million grant from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration to help carry out the two priorities starting in fall 2018. The grant funds the work of Colorado Opioid Synergy—Larimer & Weld, or CO-SLAW, tasked with developing a Hub & Spoke Medication-Assisted Treatment, MAT, system to treat overdose and opioid addiction. Hub & Spoke represents a network of care that i n c l u d e s

Cyndi Dodds, co-chairwoman of the Northern Colorado Opioid Prevention Work Group and chief clinical officer of SummitStone Health Partners substance use disorder treatment and primary care and mental health agencies. “There are misperceptions in terms of Medication-Assisted Treatment of taking one medication and substituting it for another,” Dodds said, referring to MAT, the national standard for treating opioid addiction. “MAT is the gold standard. It helps with withdrawal symptoms and cravings ... so people can engage in treatment and make changes in their lives. ... It doesn’t have any adverse impacts on mental and physical functioning.”

Depending on where individuals are in their opioid addiction, they may start at one level of care and transfer to another level or type of medication as they move through the hub and spokes, Dodds said. The hub represents an addiction treatment center and the various spokes are smaller clinics or medical offices with different intensity levels of service, she said.

CO-SLAW works closely with the Larimer County Sheriff’s Office and Larimer County Jail to provide care coordination for inmates undergoing MAT treatment. The idea is to keep inmates on their medications when they enter the jail and start them on a treatment program during their incarceration. Upon their release, they are connected with a community provider to be able to continue receiving care.

The final priority of the work group is harm reduction focused on reducing the ill effects caused by the use and misuse of opioids. Part of that involves educating the public and health care providers about the safe use of Naloxone, an overdose reversal drug, and distributing Naloxone kits carried by law enforcement officers and first responders. Naloxone kicks opioids off the brain’s receptor sites, so that overdose doesn’t continue and withdrawal symptoms are reversed.

“This is the piece that saves lives,” Dodds said. “It really is educating our community, educating our doctors, educating our counselors and community at large, to prevent misuse and to look at alternatives.”

UCHealth implants new sleep apnea device

By BizWest Staff

news@bizwest.com

LOVELAND — UCHealth is the first health system in the Rocky Mountain region to offer the latest, implantable treatment option for people with central sleep apnea.

A male patient at UCHealth Medical Center of the Rockies in Loveland became the first in an eight-state region to receive the implantable Remede System, according to information provided by UCHealth.

Central sleep apnea is a neurological condition in which a person's sleep is disordered because the brain does not send the correct signals to the breathing muscles during sleep. It can lead to excessive daytime sleepiness, reduced exercise capacity, a decrease in blood oxygen levels, difficulty concentrating and irregular or very fast heart rhythms.

It occurs frequently in high altitudes, but it also is more prevalent among people who have other health conditions such as heart failure and atrial fibrillation, according to Dr. Mark Neagle, a UCHealth sleep medicine specialist.

"Treatment for this particular type of sleep apnea has been a significant challenge over the years. But this new technology is a major step forward that will enable us to treat these patients more effectively," Neagle said.

Dr. Robert Kiser, the UCHealth cardiologist who performed the first procedure at MCR, said the new system will especially benefit central sleep patients with congestive heart failure.

Heart failure is when the heart can't pump as well as it should. Or the heart muscle can't relax and fill the pumping chamber with blood. According to the Heart Failure Society of America, the condition affects more than 6.5 million people in the United States.

"About a third of patients with heart failure also experience central sleep apnea," Kiser said. "This technology can treat central sleep apnea effectively, which can lead to a tremendous boost in quality of life."

The new system, which is implanted by a cardiologist during a minimally invasive procedure, was approved by the Food and Drug Administration in late 2017. It includes a small pacemaker-like device that is implanted under the skin in the upper part of the chest area. It includes two thin wires, one that delivers the stimulation to the phrenic nerve to tell the diaphragm to breathe and another that senses when the patient breathes. The patient is lightly sedated during the procedure and most patients are able to go home after a one-night stay in the hospital.

About six weeks after the procedure, the patient returns for a followup appointment with a sleep medicine physician to activate the system. Once fully optimized, the system will restore sleep throughout the night by monitoring and stabilizing the patient's breathing pattern.

The best candidates for the procedure include patients who have moderate to severe central sleep apnea and no known condition that would require magnetic resonance imaging.

In a clinical study, the new system reduced number of sleep apnea events for 87 percent of patients, improved quality of life for 79 percent of patients and significantly reduced daytime sleepiness for patients.

The system is the newest addition to the UCHealth Sleep Lab.

In 2016, UCHealth was the first in Colorado to offer Inspire Sleep therapy, another sleep apnea technology that helps patients with obstructive sleep apnea — which occurs when throat muscles intermittently relax and block the airway during sleep — who can't tolerate use of continuous positive airway pressure, or CPAP, while sleeping.

Although the two systems treat different types of sleep apnea, they both involve minimally invasive procedures to implant the devices and a multidisciplinary team of providers working together.

"With the addition of the new system, our program can help even more people and improve their lives," Neagle said. "We are the only sleep program in the Mountain West that is able to offer patients the full spectrum of solutions depending on their condition — from the Inspire and Remede devices to the oral devices and CPAP therapy."

Program gathers data for precision medicine

GREELEY — Modern medicine has created miraculous cures for diseases and conditions that at one time baffled doctors. Yet the magic bullet that saves one patient or one group of patients doesn't necessarily work on all.

And researchers — or families — are left to wonder why.

In recent years, medical scientists have adopted the term “precision medicine,” meaning medicine that is tuned to be the most effective with the specific, individual patient. Figuring out how to apply precision medicine, short of trial and error, is the goal of a new program just launched in Colorado at North Colorado Medical Center in Greeley.

All of Us research program, headed in Colorado by regional medical director Dr. Michael Bradfield, a family physician at NCMC, will contribute to a national program to gather real patient data in hopes of finding the next great cure for major diseases.

Partners in the program include hospital systems like Banner Health, universities, regional medical centers, federal agencies such as the National Institutes of Health, and health-care foundations. Together, they will recruit 1 million people who agree to share their health histories with the program so that researchers can tap the data to spot trends and outcomes among similar genetic groups.

“It's not a study but a resource,” said Bradfield. “It will be a catalyst for studies.”

“This will strive to develop ways to measure risks for a range of diseases based on environmental exposures, genetic factors, regional health practices and the interplay between these factors... Our hope is that in the coming years we will have access to a wide range of study results that will help them live healthier lives through better disease prevention and treatment,” he said.

Funded for 10 years by the NIH, precision medicine is seen as one of two primary health-care emphases, Bradfield said. The other emphasis is the opioid crisis.

Precision medicine treats patients based on lifestyle, gender and other characteristics of individuals. “Some people's genetics predispose them for certain treatments,” he said. Figuring out what works most effectively is the long term aim of All of Us.

Bradfield's four-person team at NCMC has just begun the program in Colorado. As of late May, 159 people had signed up to participate. In Banner overall, 27,000 have enrolled so far. Banner's Arizona operations began participation two years ago.

Kim Arnett, research assistant, said people who sign up will first sign consent forms including one that gives permission for the program to access health histories. They'll be asked to complete three surveys or questionnaires. Then, they'll be examined by a health-care professional to gather baseline data — blood pressure, blood and urine testing results, and more — to be entered into the databank. The program hopes to establish relationships with participants that extend for many years, perhaps for the remainder of the participants' lives.

"We want the database to represent the diversity of the United States," Bradfield said. While the program is not targeting any specific populations, it does want populations under-represented in the past to be part of it — rural residents, for example, or those earning lower incomes.

Participants need to be 18 years old or older, with pediatric participants to be added later. Participants need to be able to give consent and not be incarcerated.

So far, those most interested seem to be people who have an interest in health care or people who have been frustrated with their care or the care of family members, Bradfield said.

"This is the largest thing since the Framingham study," Bradfield said, referring to the cardiovascular disease study that began in 1948 in Framingham, Mass., which continues today.

Michael Risse, clinical research coordinator for All of Us at NCMC, said he became part of the program because he wants to be part of something that reduces trial and error in medicine.

All of Us has participants from across the country, as shown on this map. As of late May, 120,000 people had registered for the program.

COURTESY ALL OF US

Research assistant Daniel Marin said family health history drove him to join the effort.

Bradfield said the program is working with partners such as the University of Northern Colorado, Sunrise Community Health clinics, North Colorado Family Medicine and the Weld County Health Department to get the word out and to share survey data when possible.

Information about the program is now available online at <http://www.joinallofus.org/en/videos/all-us-anthem> with specifics about the local program at <http://www.joinallofus.org/noco>.

Eventually, a patient advisory board will be formed to help researchers determine what to study using the collected data.

DAN ENGLAND/BIZWEST

Dr. Kristin Tempco talks to Stephen Ferguson, 72, of Fort Collins about the circulation in his legs during a recent exam at the VA clinic in Fort Collins.

Fort Collins VA clinic comes out of shadows

By Dan England

news@bizwest.com

FORT COLLINS — When veterans walk into the Veterans Administration clinic in Fort Collins or Loveland, they might just want to see their doctor. What they get is an army.

There's a team assigned to every veteran, and that team includes a pharmacist, a social worker and a mental health provider. They're all there to assess the vet's overall health, not just diagnose disease.

The system started a couple of years ago, when all that specialized care was integrated into primary care. The VA did it in part to match health-care networks' advancement, but it also was an acknowledgment that mental health is a big piece of a person's overall health.

Mental health may be coming into its own after decades of living in the shadows. We now live in an era where Cigna's latest marketing campaign stars actors such as Ted Danson with the message "your physical and emotional health are more connected than you think." But it's a welcome change that in some ways the VA needed to lead, said Sam House, the public affairs officer for the Cheyenne VA Health Care System. Twenty veterans kill themselves every day, and 14 never step foot in a VA clinic.

"There are individuals who need help, for one reason or another, and they've never reached out to the VA," House said. "It's irritating. Our number-one priority is suicide prevention."

The Fort Collins clinic plays a role in that. There veterans find many of the same services people expect to find in a physician's office, but there are also services that specialize in veteran care. These include police officers who know how to talk down an angry vet because they were veterans themselves, and social workers who can help homeless veterans, in addition to mental health professionals who understand PTSD and other common ailments veterans face.

"The advantage of the VA is every single one of our providers are focused only on veterans," House said. "That's all we treat. So our providers are able to understand, say, a hearing loss a vet may have that someone in the private sector may not quite understand."

Although the awareness is increasing, and veterans are more comfortable talking about their mental health, they still face obstacles that civilians may not understand. House said soldiers are trained to suck it up, not to get in touch with their feelings.

"You learn in basic training that if you (seek help) for your mental health, your career is over," said House, who spent a good part of his career with the U.S. Army in public affairs. "Maybe that's not as true these days. But that is what is ingrained in them. They should not talk

"You learn in basic training that if you (seek help) for your mental health, your career is over. Maybe that's not as true these days. But that is what is ingrained in them. They should not talk about it. They just need to get over it."

Sam House, the public affairs officer for the Cheyenne VA Health Care System about it. They just need to get over it."

The issue, House said, is not combat. The issue is coming home. Soldiers don't get the kind of training they need to integrate themselves back into society, House said.

"They generally aren't ready for a lot of stuff," he said. "That is one of my biggest frustrations as a vet myself. It's not with the VA system. It's with the Department of Defense."

The system generates a lot of demand from veterans, including close to a dozen who stop in daily without appointments. Fort Collins, the largest city in Northern Colorado, is feeling the crunch. The clinic is smaller than most, with nearly 10,000 square feet of space. That will change in a couple of years, when the VA clinic will move to a brand new, 90,000-square-foot building more fitting for a city the size of Fort Collins.

The VA continues to evolve, with telemedicine and whole health offerings such as acupuncture, essential oils and other alternative medicine, in addition to more traditional care such as cancer treatments, and it will continue to expand its mental health treatments.

That helped Stephen Ferguson, 72, of Fort Collins, who served in Vietnam with the U.S. Army. He was recently diagnosed with PTSD after reconnecting with some Vietnam vets and discussing the war. They call it "late onset" PTSD, Ferguson said.

"I didn't think I was real bad," he said. "But I did get better."

New Greeley hospital to open by mid-summer

The new UCHealth Greeley Hospital will open this summer in west Greeley.

By Dan England

news@bizwest.com

GREELEY — Perhaps it's a good thing Marilyn Schock works in a hospital.

UCHealth is close to turning Greeley into a two-hospital town, a huge milestone for a mid-sized city with one established hospital since 1904. The new UCHealth Greeley Hospital should be open by the first part of July, depending on state inspections, and there won't be a soft opening like the kind you see when a big restaurant comes to town.

In fact, research shows that more than 25 percent of the patients at UCHealth Medical Center of the Rockies and UCHealth Poudre Valley Hospital are from Weld County, and the bulk of those patients live in Greeley. MCR in Loveland, even with more than 170 beds, occasionally finds itself stuffed to capacity. It's possible that the Greeley hospital could be close to capacity as soon as it opens, right? Just look at the numbers, and...

"You just about gave me a heart attack," Schock said, who will manage the new hospital.

Still, UCHealth's numbers show that Greeley and the area should continue to support North Colorado Medical Center, which is managed by Banner Health Systems, but also UCHealth's new hospital and the number of clinics next door that make up the new medical campus off U.S. 34 and 65th Avenue.

More than a dozen clinics now see patients in the building just east of the hospital. They opened just a couple of months ago.

"Right now so many folks go to Loveland and Fort Collins, and instead of driving over there, most of the same services will be here," Schock said. "There are people who don't want to leave Greeley for care."

The reasons for the hospital are what you'd expect if you live in Northern Colorado. The area is booming and expected to double by 2040. Greeley continues to grow mostly west as well, although there's been some recent activity on the east side. And an aging baby boomer population needs more care.

The hospital will open with 50 beds but has the capacity to grow to 96 beds with just some finishing work and will eventually support 150 beds, Schock said. UHealth has no timeline for when it will move beyond the 50. It will also offer a full emergency department. The stand-alone emergency room run by UHealth in the marketplace by King Soopers at the corner of 71st Avenue and 10th Street will become an urgent care in a few months.

“Every part of the building area was created to grow,” Schock said. “We’re opening very smart. I think we’ll be busy, but we will find out when we open. We will ramp up relatively quickly.”

UHealth hopes to work with NCMC to determine what level of care the area needs regardless of the situation. NCMC’s trauma capability, for instance, is a level higher than what UHealth

Marilyn Schock, president of the UHealth Greeley Hospital

Greeley Hospital can offer. Medical Center of the Rockies is at the same level as NCMC.

But Schock also acknowledges the two hospitals will compete for patients.

“But I think competition sharpens everyone for higher quality,” Schock said. “You have to be more at the top of your game.”

To that end, NCMC hopes to keep patients out of the hospital as UHealth opens one to compete with them. NCMC will continue to focus on urgent care and outpatient services, said Margo Karsten, western region president and the Northern Colorado CEO for NCMC, McKee and Banner Fort Collins.

“Patients want better access to care, not beds,” Karsten said. “What we want to work on is high-quality, low-cost options, such as more outpatient procedures. That will lower health care costs. Adding more inpatient beds is not the direction you want to take if you want to lower health-care costs.”

NCMC also will find ways to differentiate itself from UHealth, such as its recent acquisition of TRU Hospice of Northern Colorado, Karsten said, and its geriatric mental health care services in Loveland. It will also emphasize its partnership with the highly respected MD Anderson cancer care center.

Whether it works, or if NCMC has anything to fear, remains to be seen. Longmont United Hospital faced a similar situation when UHealth opened its Longs Peak Hospital in 2017, and Longmont United had to lay off workers. But the opening was a culmination of the issues that began in 2014, when physicians from the Longmont Clinic across the street from Longmont United aligned with UHealth. Those physicians began to send patients to UHealth hospitals instead of Longmont United. When Longs Peak opened, Longmont United lost even more patients, something you would expect regardless of the circumstances.

“It was a 1-2 punch,” said Tina Johnson, the CEO of Longmont United Hospital who was not around at the time.

Longmont United survived by focusing on its caregivers, Johnson said.

“We believe in what they bring and how they provide a caring and individual experience,” she said, “and we promote that in our materials.”

Johnson expressed doubt that UHealth will be able to work closely with NCMC, saying “she hasn’t experienced that” as of yet.

“But I have talked to people at UHealth who are lovely, so I don’t know why that couldn’t happen,” Johnson said. “We haven’t seen the opportunity to collaborate, but we aren’t focused on that either.”

Many in Greeley do see UHealth’s opening as a way to siphon off money from the wealthier west end of the city, but Schock said UHealth’s goal isn’t to put NCMC out of business.

“It’s how to ensure to the community that you have the highest level of care,” she said. “We will work together. Hopefully the community really sees this. I’ve been in Northern Colorado for 35 years, and there aren’t many places in the U.S. that have this level of care that we have in this community.”
