Partnering to Create and Care for the Healthiest Community in the Nation

From the earliest days of caring for our neighbors, creating a healthy community was our goal.

A century later, we're proud that Boulder is ranked among the healthiest communities in our nation.

Whether it's a pandemic or seasonal epidemics,

Whether it's bringing new lives into the world or saving lives with unequalled care...

We are Boulder Community Health. We are Boulder.

Researchers hope to repurpose COVID research to fight other diseases

BY DAN MIKA

dmika@bizwest.com

While COVID-19 as a coronavirus variant is novel, the vaccines and treatments developed to fight it are anything but.

In a year marked by millions of deaths and the suffering of millions more from the disease's worst effects, scientific researchers, including some in the Boulder area, repurposed previous medical ideas to make multiple vaccines in record time amid one of the modern world's most pressing public health crises.

The first two COVID shots approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration use messenger RNA (mRNA), a concept that's decades old but redeveloped by Pfizer Inc. (NYSE: PFE) and Moderna Inc. (Nasdaq: MRNA) to face a modern problem.

A traditional vaccine like the one developed by Johnson & Johnson (NYSE: JNJ) injects a weakened portion of the COVID-19 virus into the patient, with the hope that the patient's immune system develops antibodies against it and remembers how to generate that response in case of live infection.

But messenger RNA-based vaccines don't include a weakened piece of the virus. Instead, it provides the genetic code needed to make the spike proteins that identify the virus that causes COVID-19 but without the material that causes the illness.

Once those proteins are produced in the body, the person's immune system fires up and develops a response at levels where both the Pfizer and Moderna vaccines produced immunity rates of more than 90% in final rounds of testing.

Scientists are still racing to fully understand how COVID-19 affects the body and if the current crop of vaccines will protect against mutated strains first found in Britain, Brazil and South Africa. However, there's hope that mRNA's rapid development could be a breakthrough in preventing and treating diseases by teaching the body to target the genetic codes that cause illness ranging from cancers and AIDS to more specific protection against that year's dominant strain of the flu.

Dr. Thomas Flaig, the vice chancellor of research at the University of Colorado Anschutz Medical Campus, said while studies need to keep happening to determine how long the mRNA vaccines provide immunity, the idea behind how to deploy mRNA could transfer to other areas of medical research.

"We're learning a lot about how to stimulate and train, if you will, the immune system to fight infectious diseases, and hopefully cancer," he said. "I'm optimistic that there'll be some positives out of this very difficult period in terms of understanding vaccines and how to move this forward."

Reusing medicines

While COVID-19 is a novel form in the family of coronaviruses that cause a range of illnesses from common colds to SARS, many of the drugs in use or in the pipeline to treat the disease aren't.

Remdesevir, for example, is the first antiviral medication approved for treating severe cases of COVID-19. It started life as a potential treatment for Ebola in 2016 and was approved faster than most because it already had preliminary safety trials completed before the pandemic emerged.

ARCA Biopharma Inc. (Nasdaq: ARCA), a Boulder company that focuses on genetic treatments for heart issues, is developing a similar drug. In the early days of the pandemic, COVID patients were dying due to inflammation and damage done to other vital organs, and no one was quite sure what was happening.

That caught the attention of Dr. Michael Bristow, a cardiologist and Arca's founder and CEO. His research group at CU Anschutz applied for funding to study the disease's effects on the heart when he saw that many of the patients with heart problems were suffering from blood clotting, possibly from an overreaction from their immune systems.

As it happened, Arca was in development of AB-201: a drug to treat the affliction in the heart by inhibiting the tissue factor that when activated starts the process of clotting. The company began developing AB-201 amid the rising Ebola pandemic in western Africa in 2014 and public worry that the disease would make its way to the U.S. When that didn't manifest, Arca pivoted the drug toward cardiac arrest patients.

Six years later, another public health crisis emerged where some patients showed signs of high tissue factor activity. AB-201 seemed like a drug ahead of its time. As of late January, Arca's trial is recruiting and is expected to produce initial results after the second half of 2021.

"We seem to have a perfect biologic or pharmacologic match for what could be going on, so we basically hit the gas pedal on that," he said.

Although AB-201 in theory won't be approved for use until well into this year, Bristow said the drug could be of use in patients who refused to get vaccinated or had a pre-existing condition that made them unable to get the shot.

It's also possible that a future variant of COVID could be resistant to the current crop of vaccines, a nightmare scenario made a little easier due to having more time to develop treatments against them.

Applying to other diseases

The pandemic is still raging across the world as of this story's publication, with thousands of Americans dying each day. But as the rate of vaccinations increases, albeit slowly, the country could soon see a day where COVID-19 is not the driving force of how lives are led.

At that point, the herculean amount of medical research in the past few months could begin to pivot toward treating other ailments.

Bristow said the clotting seen in COVID-19 patients has some overlap with patients with antiphospholipid syndrome, a condition where the antibodies that increase the chance of clots forming are overproduced.

The company is measuring counts of those antibodies in the patients within its current trials, with the hope that the data could transfer into another orphan drug designation down the road.

At CU, the medical school's COVIDome Project is storing tissue samples of patients who consented in a publicly-available database for researchers across the world to access.

That's a small part of what Flaig hopes will be a continued public interest in funding research and broader scientific collaboration after a year where the entire world was focused on one singular problem, a public health effort response with no match in scope other than perhaps the eradication of smallpox.

"I wouldn't think that science is a terrible place a year ago, but I think we're in a better place today to think about what we can do together," he said.

"Very professional, polite, compassionate for my situation. Would love to have them both, physician and CRNA, on my healthcare team again!"

Gyms surviving ultimate endurance exercise

BY DALLAS HELTZELL
news@bizwest.com

The COVID-19 pandemic has been a heavy lift for fitness centers in the Boulder Valley and Northern Colorado, but a return to economic health seems finally in sight.

“As of December, we had lost about half of our membership base. That’s when it really got tough when we got to about 10% of capacity when the spike [in the disease] happened,” said Allison Hockstad, general manager of Gold’s Gym in Longmont. “January was still a loss, but February is our first month projection in a year to gain more members than we’ve lost. We finally felt like we hit that plateau last month and that this will be the first month that we’re starting to climb back.”

Falling rates of coronavirus cases earned Broomfield County an upgrade to Level Blue on the state’s dial of pandemic-related restrictions in late February. For gyms, that means expansion from 25% of capacity to 50% or 175 people in a room. Also in February, businesses in Larimer County that are approved to operate under the county’s Level Up program, which permits businesses to operate with greater flexibility in terms of COVID-19 restrictions, were allowed to move to Level Yellow, which meant gyms could have up to 50 people per room.

Gyms had survived a state-ordered shutdown March 17 that lasted about three months. Some initially set up a virtual platform but then decided to close altogether. Most gyms reopened in mid-June but were limited to 25% capacity, six-foot distancing and mandatory masks.

The financial hit forced several individual studios and chains such as Gold’s and 24-Hour Fitness to seek Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The latter company permanently closed 13 Colorado gyms, including locations at 4650 W. 120th Ave. in Broomfield, 460 S. College Ave. in Fort Collins and 3001 S. 23rd Ave. in Greeley. But when restrictions were lifted partially, it opened 18 locations including at 2900 Iris Ave. in Boulder, 2208 E. Harmony Road in Fort Collins and 851 N. U.S. Highway 287 in Lafayette.

Having the finish line finally in sight is a relief after a year-long marathon of diminished returns that, at some locations, included pushback from some regular members — especially in places such as Longmont, which straddles two counties with markedly different cultural and political slants.

“We’re in an interesting area, being in Boulder County, but we have a lot of members from Weld County,” Hockstad said. “It makes it a very interesting place to work. We definitely have some members who really do not want to wear the mask, don't enjoy wearing the mask, and then some who are very passionate about everyone wearing the mask at all times. We have some gyms in different counties where it's less split, but people are definitely in disagreement here.

"I have definitely been yelled at," said Hockstad, who started at Gold's Longmont location when it opened five years ago in part of a former Dillard's department-store building in what is now Village at the Peaks. "It's more the regulations. They're more upset with the county or the state than with me, but I've never had this much pushback on anything.

"Now that it's been around for so long, most people are on board with it, but that was definitely a struggle. It's tough to work out in a mask, I will say that."

The distancing requirement was made easier by a business model that included extended hours, said Jeremy Levinson, general manager of an Anytime Fitness location about two miles north of Gold's.

"We'd make a time slot for people to come in," he said. "We're open 24 hours, so people could come in any time. The 25% capacity would mean 15 people per hour, but we didn't even typically have more than five people per hour.

"You don't have to make a reservation anymore."

All gyms stepped up their sanitation regimes, with staffers and customers alike wiping down machines after use.

At Gold's, "we're requiring members to sanitize equipment, and people are pretty good about cleaning," Hockstad said. At Anytime Fitness, Levinson said, "they wipe it down after and then we wipe it down. Then we have a cleaning crew in the morning and at night."

Gold's "changed little things," Hockstad said. "We no longer offer sweat towels or a coffee station — shared things like that. We mark off every other piece of cardio equipment, and we're offering fewer classes than we used to have. Everything is running; it's just at a lower capacity."

One of that club's features is a movie room, where members can work out on stationary bikes, treadmills and other pieces of equipment while watching a recent film. That's been a plus for customer comfort, Hockstad said.

"If people are in a separate room with four walls and a door, they can pull their mask down as long as they're in there alone," she said. "They can't be with anyone not in their household, but still that's helped for people who wanted to do harder cardio."

Allison Hockstad, general manager and director of fitness at Gold's Gym Longmont, takes a virtual class in the club's group exercise studio. Adding virtual classes (no in-person instructor) was one of the many things done to combat COVID-19.

Whereas bigger gyms generally were able to survive even the late-2020 spike in COVID-19 cases and Colorado's resulting restriction to 10% capacity, the going was much tougher for small boutique studios that already were struggling at 25% capacity. For some of those, 25% meant nine to 10 people at a time in the studio, and a reduction to 10% meant only three or four people allowed in at a time. For some small fitness and yoga studios, 10% meant spending more on payroll than they were generating in revenue.

That kind of pinch led several gym operators in August to form the Colorado Fitness Coalition to lobby government officials. Noting that the state's fitness industry generates $695 million in revenue in a typical year, the coalition warned officials that Colorado could lose an estimated 200 gyms, 22,000 jobs and $12 million in payroll taxes if restrictions weren't eased. It also pointed to a University of Oregon study of Colorado health clubs released in December that used 32 weeks' worth of Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment data, encompassing nearly 8.5 million check-ins, and found no link to the 59 outbreaks reported by CDPHE. The coalition contended that the results showed that gym attendance was safer than visiting bars, restaurants or grocery stores.

However, a study released in January by the University of Colorado Boulder noted that the body of an exercising person emits as many chemicals as those of up to five sedentary people. It said those emissions from breath and perspiration, when combined with the chemicals used for sanitation, form new airborne chemicals with unknown impacts to indoor air quality.

As a whole, the fitness industry has made changes — some experimental, others long-term — that could forever change how gyms are designed and run. Changes in ventilations systems already are being credited with keeping clubs' infection rate low, and many centers are developing secure outdoor exercise spaces as well as virtual classes and trainer-led exercises.

Fitness consumers have developed different habits as well that may persist long after gyms have returned to normal — or whatever the post-pandemic normal looks like.

"As soon as the lockdowns took effect, the home-fitness business — everything from yoga mats to high-tech cardio machines — took off like wildfire," said Matt Powell, vice president and senior industry adviser for market research company NPD Group. He said revenue from those retail sales more than doubled, to $2.3 billion nationwide, from March to October, with sales of treadmills up 135% and stationary bikes nearly tripling.

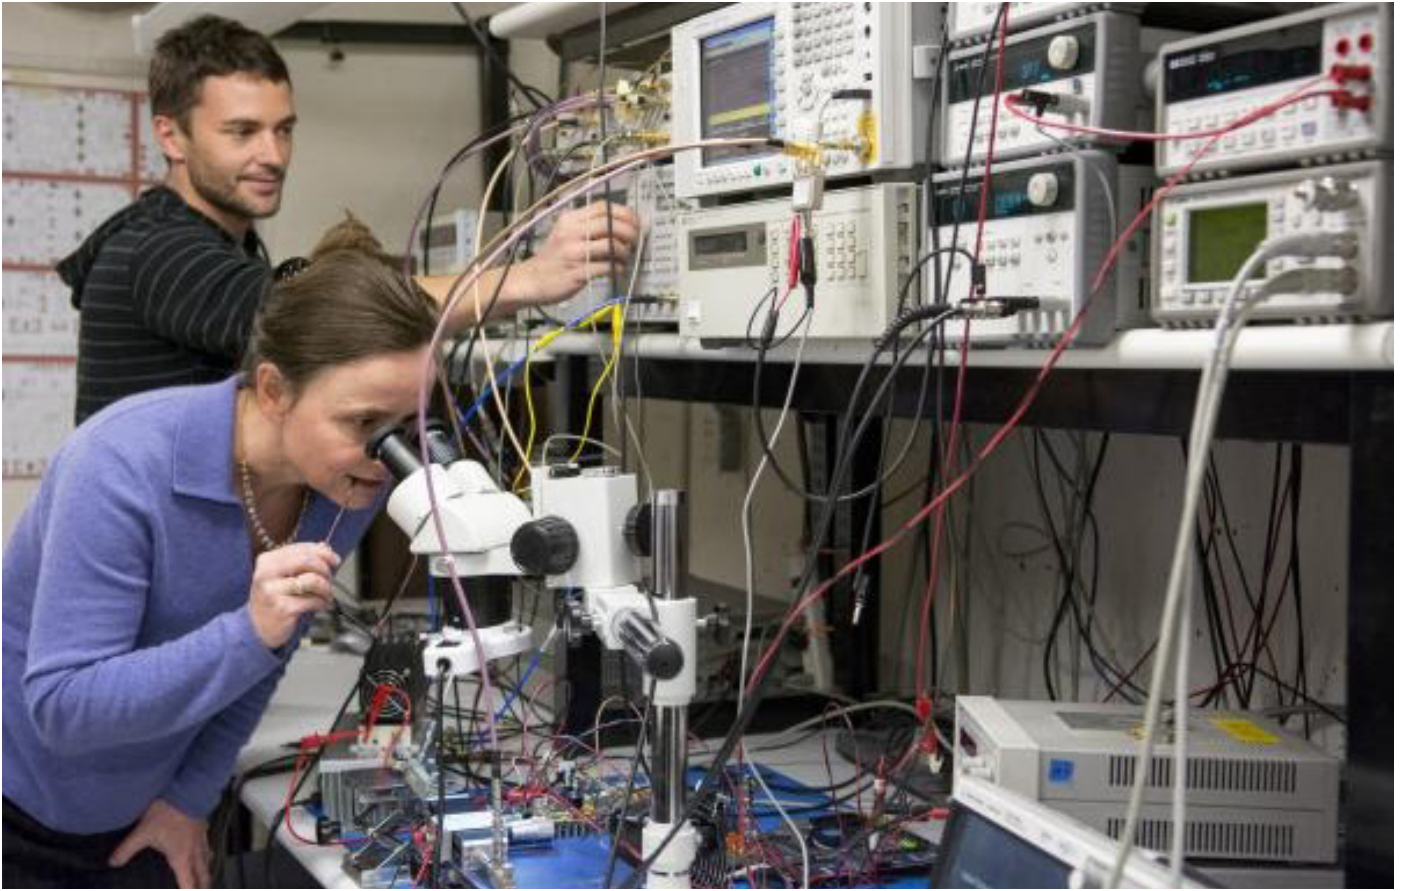

They're hitting the outdoors as well. Managers of tracts ranging from city and county parks to Rocky Mountain National Park have noted sizable spikes in use, especially by trail runners.

Still, spring 2021 is bringing sprouts of optimism at most fitness centers.

"As a facility we have had no outbreaks," Hockstad said. "We feel that the gym is a safe place to be with the precautions we have, the masks and the lower capacity."

"Just this week we had multiple older people come back saying they've gotten both of their vaccinations. They're just starting to flock back. That's what's going to be the key — for people to feel more comfortable coming back to the gym.

"It's been super hard," Hockstad said, "but I'm feeling optimistic for the first time in a long time this month that things are going to get better."

CU professor Zoya Popovic helps develop innovative thermometer

BY SHELLEY WIDHALM
news@bizwest.com

To develop a noninvasive internal thermometer, University of Colorado professor Zoya Popovic had to combine several disciplines and bring together medicine with electromagnetics, radio frequencies and algorithms, plus attract several investors to provide the funding.

Popovic, distinguished professor of electrical, computer and energy engineering at CU Boulder and a CU professor since 1990, and her team of doctoral students developed a small wearable non-invasive and purely passive sensor that can measure temperature several centimeters below the skin. The sensor can be used for situations such as inflammation, tumors, brain tissue after an injury or stroke, and possibly lung temperature for symptoms associated with COVID-19.

“You need to know a lot of different things, so that’s why it’s not been solved. There is nothing out there that can do this that can measure internal body temperature,” said Popovic, who holds a PhD in electrical engineering from California Institute of Technology in Pasadena, which she earned in 1990, and a bachelor’s degree in the same field from the University of Belgrade, Serbia, Yugoslavia, which she earned in 1985. “I’ve talked to a lot of doctors. They’ve convinced me that this is worth putting time into.”

Popovic pitched her innovation among 14 university science, engineering and bioscience innovators in November 2020 during the Lab Venture Challenge, hosted by Venture Partners at CU Boulder to fund projects that have commercial potential and can be turned into business ventures, while also being scientifically supported. Twelve grants were awarded, and Popovic and her business partner, Jim Pollock, received one of them for the top amount of $125,000.

Pollock, an entrepreneur with an electrical engineering degree from Massachusetts Institute of Technology, created a company, LumenAstra, in November 2020 specifically to bring the project to fruition, and serves as its chief executive officer, while Popovic is chief technical officer. With his company, he was able to license a patent from the university and obtain sole rights — the patent had been issued in December 2019.

“The venture funding will help with first steps,” Popovic said. “The company is just beginning, but we already are getting some funds to develop the technology, from agencies interested in developing and commercializing the technology.”

POPOVIC

Popovic didn't originally set out to develop an internal thermometer, working primarily for the past 15-plus years with her graduate research students on high-efficiency radio transmitters for cellular and satellite communications, as well as radar and heating. She graduated more than 60 doctoral students, each with a different project within the fields of radio engineering and applied electromagnetics. She typically writes a proposal for a problem that needs to be solved, obtains funding from the government — such as the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Department of Defense, Department of Energy, National Science Foundation and National Institute of Standards and Technology — large companies, small businesses and foundations, and hires graduate students or post-doctoral fellows to conduct the research, which often becomes their dissertation topic. Her average amount of funding per year has been about $1.5 million over the past few decades.

“It's effectively like running a small company but organized differently,” Popovic said.

Popovic originally worked on making cell phone tower transmitters more efficient and, because she understands radio frequencies, was contacted about a problem with soldiers overheating under heavy training or in extreme climates. She made a prototype thermometer, came up with some theories and published a paper — and then she got excited about the prospects of the project in terms of its many possible applications to help people. She figured out how to measure internal body temperature using natural emission of tissues in the lower microwave frequency range that can penetrate the skin (the wavelength is larger and about the same size of that “I mostly enjoy working with students, with young people. I know they're smart, and I turn them into experts and everyone wants to hire them. ... I like the teaching, but most of all, I like to work individually with students.”

Zoya Popovic, professor of electrical, computer and energy engineering at CU Boulder and a CU professor for a cell phone frequency) to about 5 centimeters deep.

Popovic's device works in the quiet radio band used by radio astronomers, where the interference is low and transmission isn't allowed.

“We can use this band because it gives us penetration and can measure through most tissues,” Popovic said.

The device consists of a probe antenna connected to a sensitive receiver. The signal at the output of the receiver is processed using algorithms to differentiate the tissue layers and their temperatures.

“My goal is to estimate the temperature of the tissue layers under the skin. One measurement is the total of all the tissues,” Popovic said. “You have to do math to determine the temperature of each layer. To do that, you need to know electromagnetics.”

Popovic wrote a proposal to the National Science Foundation and received funding for her research from 2014 to 2017. She hired two graduate students to prove the principle, develop the device and take measurements on tissue phantoms.

Recently, Popovic wrote another proposal and received three more years of funding from NSF for a new PhD student to work on this topic for his dissertation. In addition, the receiver was improved further and designed on a chip, which will help with commercialization, allowing for testing on humans and making the product cost-effective and wearable, Popovic said.

Popovic gets involved in projects like the internal thermometer to be able to work closely with her students.

“I mostly enjoy working with students, with young people,” Popovic said. “I know they're smart, and I turn them into experts and everyone wants to hire them. ... I like the teaching, but most of all, I like to work individually with students.”

Rob Streeter, a PhD electrical engineering candidate in his second year, is part of the research team for the internal thermometer. Before deciding on a school, he scheduled time to meet with some of the professors at CU Boulder

“Zoya was wildly intelligent but very energetic and had the coolest project,” Streeter said, adding that he liked the mix of disciplines it included. “What makes Zoya a great professor is her ability to identify what her students are passionate about and make it work as a project. She has incredible energy to devote to her students.”

Philip Zurek, a PhD electrical engineering candidate in his fifth year, likes how Popovic “cares really deeply about her students,” he said.

“That's what drives everything she does. She's willing to put in plenty of time to help students reach their potential,” Zurek said, adding that Popovic is available before and after class and extends her office hours. “It shows in the quality of students who come out under her professorship and what they end up achieving in their careers.”

The students, once they graduate, do not have trouble finding a job and instead have trouble choosing which one to take, Zurek said.

“They know Zoya is able to produce knowledgeable students, so that has never been a problem for anybody,” Zurek said.

Popovic was named a distinguished professor in 2010 and Lockheed Martin Endowed Chair in 2017. She developed five undergraduate and graduate electromagnetics and microwave laboratory courses and coauthored “Introductory Electromagnetics,” published in 2000, for a junior-level electrical and computer engineering course.

There's COVID. And 'Long COVID'

BY DAN MIKA

dmika@bizwest.com

LOVELAND — Chad Wittenmyer's long, red beard has grown unmanaged since March, seemingly at the same rate as his pain.

Twelve months ago, the 40-year old father and stepfather of four was fabricating windmill blades and was in the best shape of his adult life.

But after he contracted COVID-19 in March, a host of medical issues started to emerge. Constant fatigue set in. His heart rhythm was off, and he struggled to breathe under exertion. Eventually, pains and neuropathies developed in his extremities.

Wittenmyer is among those suffering the worst form of "Long COVID," a catch-all for ongoing symptoms that some COVID-19 survivors endure after the infection period.

Medical researchers aren't sure why an estimated one-third of the approximately 28 million Americans who test positive have some level of worse health after their infection period, nor have they figured out why some patients report mild symptoms and others are wracked with pain.

For most of the past year, the focus of scientists and governments was to reduce the spread and death toll and to eventually vaccinate enough people to stop the virus' threat. But after the pandemic is contained and life begins to enter a post-COVID era, how will they manage a new class of millions of Americans who may never fully recover?

Tests

Wittenmyer and his family were on a vacation in Mexico and arrived back in the U.S. two days before international travel was suspended between the countries. His employer ordered him to quarantine for two weeks since he had been abroad, and while doing so, a friend of his, who later tested positive, brought some food for the family.

On the first day after he returned to work, Wittenmyer broke a moderate fever, began coughing and struggled to breathe behind his mask at work. On the second day, he lasted 45 minutes into his shift before he lost the strength to turn a wrench.

During a video appointment, Wittenmyer's doctor said his symptoms matched COVID and said he likely was infected. At that point, COVID tests were in such short supply that they were only used to diagnose people requiring intensive-care beds.

But Wittenmyer's strength didn't return.

"Before going to Mexico, I was the most physically fit I've ever been in my entire life," he said. "I worked 12-hour shifts in the factory, which was very physically demanding going up and down ladders all day and lifting heavy things and moving stuff around. And then, all of a sudden, I'm not even able to do what essentially was a simple task."

The aftershocks of illness

Dr. Daniel Goldberg, a faculty member at the University of Colorado Anschutz Campus who studies medical history and ethics, said it's fairly common for an acute medical issue to trigger lasting medical issues.

For example, myalgic encephalomyelitis, or what used to be called chronic fatigue syndrome, is similar to the extreme fatigue that some Long COVID patients experience. It's not known what exactly causes ME, but researchers estimated that between 830,000 to 2.5 million Americans had it, and it cost the U.S. economy between $17 billion to $24 billion annually due to lost wages and medical costs.

However, Goldberg said medical practitioners have historically been poor at treating patients whose pain evades diagnostics because they often simply don't believe the patient is as sick as they're saying.

Those illnesses are known as "contested illnesses," and Goldberg is not surprised that some people's severe symptoms are being denied as real, as are their claims for disability insurance or accommodations at work.

"The central nervous (system), which is chronic pain, doesn't show up on scans and blood work, things like that. And so that is a major factor in why people who've lived with chronic pain are treated so poorly by people, both within and without health systems, by health professionals and others, as well by lawmakers and, unfortunately, by family members and by loved ones," he said.

A dispute over what's real

After he spent another two weeks quarantined on the advice of his doctor, Wittenmyer continued to struggle and went on bouts of short-term disability until he was terminated on Aug. 1 since he was no longer able to work.

His long-term disability insurer contacted his doctor and heard his list of symptoms but later denied him coverage because he had never tested positive for either an active-infection test or an antibody test that would have proven past infection.

"There have been no physical exams of diagnostic testing to support your subjective complains (sic) that would warrant restrictions and limitations from working," the insurer wrote in a letter to Wittenmyer that was reviewed by BizWest.

But Wittenmyer wasn't sick enough in March to get one of the few COVID tests being produced at the time, meaning he has no evidence other than his doctor's virtual diagnosis that he was infected.

Scott Skinner-Thompson, a professor at the University of Colorado Law School that focuses on civil rights, said that many of the symptoms of Long COVID would be covered under the broad definitions of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

That landmark law defines a disability as any physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities. Symptoms such as fatigue, chronic pain or bouts of shortness of breath are likely to qualify and would require employers to make accommodations for those employees, regardless of medical proof.

"Just because a doctor may not be able to pinpoint the symptoms or impairment to COVID the disease, that doesn't mean that they will be prevented from falling under the statutory definition of disability under the ADA," he said.

T.J. Giest, the director of claims, initial and consideration for Social Security Disability Insurance assistance firm TrueHelp, told BizWest that his company has seen a growing number of Social Security claims from people who either developed severe forms of Long COVID or had prior medical issues that were inflamed after their infection.

The Social Security Administration was already leaving applications with three to five-month wait times for first-time claims before the pandemic, and Giest said those wait times are going to become longer as more people apply for long-term disability and the pandemic lengthens wait times.

He worries that even longer wait times will put the most vulnerable claimants into financial peril.

"The longer individuals have to wait for their disability claim to be processed and ultimately awarded, there's increased likelihood of bankruptcies and foreclosures and general instability, disruption and individuals lose their health care," he said.

Long COVID accommodations at scale

If the CDC's estimate that a third of COVID survivors carry some form of Long COVID, that would mean at least 8.4 million Americans are facing mild to major symptoms of a condition that science doesn't know much about yet.

Kevin Williams, the legal director of the Colorado Cross-Disability Coalition, said that ultimately, an employee who has a disability has to be able to perform the basic duties of that job with or without accommodation.

That's where a Long COVID claim could get tricky. Williams can't walk due to a spinal cord injury, but he's a lawyer and can do his job using speech-to-text software and other accommodations.

But for Wittenmyer and others in his position with physically intensive jobs, they may not be able to return to that line of work or in other lines that fit their skill sets.

"There might be some things he could do, but he probably can't do the job that he did before," he said.

Nor can Wittenmyer apply for unemployment benefits, as those programs require someone to be physically able to work.

Goldberg said people who live with chronic pain often aren't given the accommodations they need at work, school or other societal institutions, and he fully expects that to apply to those suffering with moderate or severe Long COVID.

However, he thinks that as more parts of the population report having Long COVID and researchers learn more about the condition's causes and treatments, the stigma will reduce. He compared it to post-traumatic stress disorder, which shrunk as a contested illness over the decades after more veterans returned from combat.

"It's certainly possible that just the sheer impact that COVID has had and the numbers of people who live with Long COVID will change our attitudes toward the people who live with it, and what it means to have Long COVID and maybe that will result in better treatment of people," he said.

The first glimmers of Long COVID research

In the final week of February, researchers who were collecting real-world data for the Pfizer vaccine said that the two doses cut down symptomatic cases of COVID-19 by 94% across all age groups, a figure that gives hope to the idea that vaccines can put an end to a short but intense era of human suffering.

Although an initially slow vaccine rollout and the threat of emerging variants loom, the pandemic is showing signs of curbing across much of the U.S. as of this story's publication, and public health experts believe large parts of American society can return to something resembling normal by the late summer or fall.

As fewer resources are poured into treating active COVID, a few clinics devoted to treating Long COVID are starting to form across the country.

That's a relief to Wittenmyer, who has spent much of the past few months as a stay-at-home dad and wondering when his condition will get the kind of deep research that other maladies would.

His wife and children are what's keeping him getting out of bed each morning despite constant pain across his body. While his wife works, Wittenmyer cooks, folds the laundry and holds his youngest son during naptime.

All the while, he waits for the pandemic to end, and he hopes that his condition doesn't last a lifetime.

"I know that the medical industry as a whole is kind of in triage right now, just trying to get to the people who are the worst," he said. "But there's still something wrong with me."

Fight against COVID gets a shot in the arm

BY DALLAS HELTZELL

news@bizwest.com

The rollout of vaccines designed to prevent infection with the coronavirus is prompting employers in the Boulder Valley, Northern Colorado and nationwide to take a wide range of actions — from mandates to incentives — to get needles into the arms of employees and customers alike.

The massive push for vaccinations — especially for health-care workers, teachers and people age 65 and older — comes as the state acts to jumpstart an economy battered by shutdowns, distancing rules and other restrictions ordered to try to stem the spread of the deadly virus.

Although the number of active COVID-19 outbreaks and hospitalizations continues to decline, the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment still identified 741 outbreaks across the state during the final week of February.

One of the largest outbreaks occurred at Lifespring Covenant Church in Loveland, where four staff members and 16 attendees tested positive for the virus, CDPHE reported.

A similar spike in January prompted Fort Collins-based Columbine Health Systems to require that all staff members at its care facilities in Larimer and Weld counties receive COVID-19 vaccines by April 1. That decision was made after CDPHE reported 153 cases among employees and residents at Columbine's North Shore Health and Rehabilitation Center in Loveland. Three residents died at North Shore from the virus, according to the state.

Other health-care facilities have taken different approaches short of mandates.

At Centura Health, which runs several health-care facilities including Avista Adventist Hospital in Lafayette and Longmont United Hospital, "We are not mandating it at this time for our associates," said spokesman Kevin Massey. "We're strongly encouraging our caregivers to receive the vaccine. We've been working on campaigns to really encourage it, explaining the reasons we feel it is safe and effective, based on the science, but it is not a requirement."

In a written statement, Massey added that "COVID-19 vaccines were released under Emergency Use Authorization, and as such we do not feel it is ethical to compel our associates to receive the vaccine. This is true of most health systems across the country."

Labor-law experts do say COVID-19 vaccinations can be required as a condition of employment — but with certain exceptions.

In a guidance on pandemic preparedness written in 2009 during an H1N1 outbreak, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said U.S. employers could require employees to be vaccinated against influenza. However, University of Michigan law professor Kate Andrias told Healthline there are a number of exceptions.

Under the Americans with Disabilities Act, she said, "an employer must provide reasonable accommodations to workers who have medical conditions that make them unable to take the vaccine, if a reasonable accommodation is possible."

Also, under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, she said, employers might refuse vaccinations if they have a sincerely held religious belief that precludes the shots and if not being vaccinated doesn't impose an undue hardship on the employer.

However, she added, "a personal or political opposition to vaccination is not sufficient."

Holly Helstrom, who teaches First Amendment rights for employees at Columbia University, told Healthline that "employers can and have fired employees based on lifestyle choices related to their health, including if they smoke cigarettes or drink alcohol," so "refusal to get a COVID vaccine if your employer is requiring one could get you fired and your employer would be within their legal rights to do so" — especially "if you work for a private-sector at-will employer."

At Columbine, health systems director Yvonne Myers defended the decision to mandate vaccinations.

"We will not get out of this pandemic unless we can get everyone vaccinated," she said. "The vaccine is the only way we can get out of this."

“Employers can and have fired employees based on lifestyle choices related to their health, including if they smoke cigarettes or drink alcohol,” so “refusal to get a COVID vaccine if your employer is requiring one could get you fired and your employer would be within their legal rights to do so” — especially “if you work for a private-sector at-will employer.”

Holly Helstrom, teaches First Amendment rights for employees at Columbia University

Columbine didn't require vaccinations at first, Myers said, but low staff participation forced its hand. “And then when we mandated it, we saw staff digging in and asking more questions. They had a lot of concerns — but based on a lot of misinformation in the social-media space.

“You could do a whole sociological study on the journey of vaccine acceptance,” she said.

Myers estimated that about 50 of Columbine's approximately 1,525 staffers pushed back against the mandate. “Some employees have gone ahead and given their notice, saying they're not going to take the vaccine,” she said. Others have sought exemptions based on medical or religious reasons, and Columbine is considering them on a case-by-case basis, Myers said. “And then people are notified whether it's granted or not.”

Columbine can't do in-house vaccinations until it acquires a medical-grade freezer, so Walgreens had been holding clinics at Columbine facilities. With that contract now expired, Columbine applied with other suppliers until UHealth in late February agreed to vaccinate staffers.

“So now, because we got UHealth to be the interim between Walgreens and getting our own,” Myers said, “we can tell staff, ‘As long as you have registered and have an appointment, you don't have to have gotten the vaccine by April 1 to continue working for us.’”

Some employers are offering juicy incentives for their employees to get vaccinated.

Target stores, for instance, announced in February that it would offer up to four hours of pay for all its hourly workers if they get the two shots; Target also will cover the cost of Lyft rides to vaccination appointments as long as the trip doesn't exceed $15.

Orlando, Florida-based Darden Restaurants, whose brands include Olive Garden, announced that it would give its hourly workers two hours of pay for each shot they get. Trader Joe's grocery stores offered the same incentive, and Dollar General stores will give workers a one-time payment equivalent to four hours of regular pay after they receive a completed COVID-19 vaccination.

More than 2,500 employees of JBS USA's Greeley meat-processing plant will be able to get vaccinations beginning March 5. Early in the pandemic, an outbreak at the plant left 500 workers testing positive and six dead.

Signups flow in to reopened state health-insurance exchange

BY DALLAS HELTZELL

news@bizwest.com

Although official figures aren't yet in, managers of Colorado's health-insurance exchange say signups during the reopened enrollment period are slow but still steady.

"Since it's so close to the end of the last open enrollment, we haven't seen a really big heavy volume like we did when we opened up the special open-enrollment period in response to COVID-19 last March," said Monica Caballeros, communications manager at Connect for Health Colorado. "We are seeing folks coming in. Our assistance network and our broker community are really key in helping spread the word to folks who maybe just missed the boat on open enrollment that they do have a chance to sign up if they don't have coverage.

"It's a little more than last year, is what our data folks have let us know."

After President Joe Biden, during his first week in office, issued an executive order that reopened enrollment for the Affordable Care Act's federal marketplace at healthcare.gov for three months beginning Feb. 15, the Colorado exchange responded by reopening its own signup period a week earlier, on Feb. 8, in collaboration with the state Division of Insurance.

The state and federal exchanges were reopened especially to help people who lost their employer-based health insurance when their workplaces shut down — either temporarily or permanently — because of the fallout from the COVID-19 pandemic.

"I am encouraged to see President Biden and his administration take action on this front, acknowledging the fact that so many remain without health insurance due to the continued impact of COVID-19," said Colorado Insurance Commissioner Michael Conway in a news release. "The Division of Insurance will work with Connect for Health Colorado to make sure this additional enrollment period works to help Coloradans get covered."

During the normal enrollment period, which ran from Nov. 1 to Jan. 15, Caballeros said, Colorado recorded almost 180,000 new signups — up from 166,850 the previous year — but "not the huge boom that we saw during our emergency special-enrollment period last year." During that special period, which began March 20 — a week after the state shut down many businesses and schools because of the pandemic — and ran through April 30, 14,000 people signed up for coverage.

"We don't really know what the factors would have been that contributed to the increase," Caballeros said. "It could be that more folks are shopping for the first time in the individual marketplace after having employer coverage for a while. It all boils down to the pandemic."

She emphasized that Coloradans can get free virtual or telephone enrollment assistance through the state's enrollment centers at 855-752-6749 or ConnectforHealthCO.com, or through certified brokers.

"They're still open and operating outside of open enrollment," she said.

Despite the high cost of treatment for those afflicted by the coronavirus, the state Division of Insurance had announced last fall that health-insurance premiums would actually decrease by an average of 1.4% from 2020 rates in the individual market, which includes marketplace and off-marketplace policies but not employer-provided plans. Some rural counties saw increases while some more heavily populated areas saw larger decreases, and some new plans contained 4% on average over 2020 premiums.

Insurance companies participating in the exchange submit the rates they want to charge consumers, as well as any changes to insurance policies offered, to the DOI each year. Connect for Health Colorado receives the approved plan costs and benefits from the DOI.

In a statement issued when the new rates were announced, Connect for Health Colorado chief executive Kevin Patterson said he was "encouraged by the overall stability we're seeing" in premiums.

"Colorado families continue to feel the economic impacts of the pandemic at a time when the risk of going without health coverage has never been greater," he said. According to the Colorado Health Institute, about 6.5% of Colorado residents — around 361,000 people — don't have insurance coverage.

The premium rates were held down to the smallest change in years partly thanks to a "reinsurance" program, without which, state officials estimated, premiums would be about 20.8% higher. The reinsurance program reimburses insurance companies some of the cost of covering people with higher medical bills.

The DOI also had ordered insurance companies that wanted to sell individual plans on the state-run exchange not to build in the cost of a possible COVID-19 vaccine or set rates that increased their profit margins.

Analysts cited other factors as well. They noted that health insurers trying to figure out what rates they would charge in 2021 were as unsure as the population as a whole about what the year would look like. While some companies projected a modest increase in how much medical care they will have to cover because of COVID-19, others speculated that, as happened in 2020, many Americans would avoid seeking treatment for non-urgent conditions, resulting in lower expenses.

The state exchange still offers four main levels of health-insurance plans, each with a different monthly premium. The most expensive Platinum plan pays about 90% of medical costs, whereas the Gold plan pays about 80%, the Silver plan about 70% and the Bronze plan about 60%. Those earning 250% or less of the federal poverty level, which is about $31,900 for a single person or about $65,500 for a family of four, may qualify for extra discounts.

IT'S TIME TO RAISE our radiology expectations

When your patients need a diagnostic imaging test, you have a myriad of choices. But did you know that where you choose to have their test performed can make all the difference?

Advanced Medical Imaging Consultants (AMIC) is a team of over 35 board-certified and subspecialty-trained radiologists. Our training goes far beyond what's required...and adds another dimension of quality and expertise when it comes to helping you accurately pinpoint health problems and achieve an accurate diagnosis.

Our expertise is relied upon at leading hospitals and health centers throughout Colorado, Wyoming and Western Nebraska. We perform MRI, CT, X-ray, ultrasound, bone density testing and the full range of women's imaging tests like 3D mammography and breast MRI. We also offer minimally invasive treatments for a host of conditions that previously required open surgery, such as spine fractures, uterine fibroids and enlarged prostate.

You and your patients deserve the best.
