Blueprints highlights key construction sector

The Boulder Valley boasts a diverse and talented construction sector, ranging from general contractors to engineers, interior designers to world-class architects.

These companies operate in one of the entrepreneurial hotbeds of the country — Boulder and Broomfield counties — but many also provide services throughout the region and nation.

It's a great pleasure to highlight the construction sector in this, the latest Blueprints construction & remodeling directory, presented by the Boulder County Business Report. In this edition, you'll find many categories of companies in the building sector, with information that includes addresses, phone numbers, Web sites, products and services, and much more.

Construction represents one of the most important industries in any economy, and many Boulder Valley companies have embraced green-building practices and design. You'll see some of those issues addressed in an article in this issue.

And, for the first time, Blueprints also features construction-related lists ranking businesses in their particular sectors. These lists have appeared previously in the pages of the Business Report. We think our readers will appreciate being able to view company listings in this targeted way.

The Blueprints directory is available on CD-ROM, or users can download the directory in its entirety using our online DataBank system. Simply log on to www.bcbcr.com to download the data in Microsoft Excel or tab-delimited formats.

I'd like to thank the advertisers who made publication of Blueprints possible, and I'd like to particularly thank our research director, Beth Edwards, and her research team, Carol Maskus and Pam Martin, for their work on Blueprints and the associated lists. Thanks also to our editorial, advertising and productions teams for their efforts at bringing Blueprints to life.

If you would like your company included in our directory — or in the associated lists — please contact our research team at research@bcbcr.com, and we'll ensure that you receive any relevant surveys in the future. Any corrections can be submitted to that address.

In the meantime, enjoy!

Transforming an empty unused room such as the basement (see basement below) into a home theater can provide countless hours of entertainment for family and friends.

COURTESY CUSTOM QUALITY THEATERS

Home movies

Right mix of lights, sound, television, furniture creates ultimate theater experience

BY SUZAN K. HEGLIN
Business Report Correspondent

When Rob Dreher was courting his future wife, a typical date was curling up under a blanket and watching a movie.

They got married, she went into education, and he started Boulder-based Custom Quality Construction LLC. Their pleasure became the focus of their business.

“When we’d do a basement finish, people were asking us about home theaters. I’ve always been a huge fan of home theaters,” Dreher said.

The company decided to create its Custom Quality Theaters business segment.

And there is a growing number of companies that can turn that seldom-used room into a place where family and friends can hang out for hours at a time.

It takes some special talents and nuances to turn a basement into a home theater and losing that “basementy” feel. One is creating the proper lighting.

“The lighting has a huge effect on the overall feel,” he said. It’s also an opportunity to add theme and style.

Another trick to lose the basement blues is to change the color scheme. Carpeting and warm colors can change the overall ambience. Carpeting also can help with the acoustics.

It took years for Dreher to finish his own home theater, but now it is his showroom. “We have people come over, and they say, ‘I thought I knew what a home theater was, but this is really something.’”

Dreher sometimes works with Howard Fischer, owner of Boulder-based Absolute Audio Video.

Fisher does the electronics side. The options range

COURTESY CUSTOM QUALITY THEATERS

Home theater glossary

HOME THEATER. Media and home electronics that deliver the movie theater experience at home. Minimum requirements are a DVD player, a television with a screen of 27 inches diagonal or more and an audio system that features Dolby Digital decoding and 5.1-channel surround sound speakers.

480I. The conventional, standard definition television signal. This contains 480 active scanning lines displayed at 30 frames per second. Interlaced ("i") scanning divides each frame into two fields of 240 lines. Each field lasts for 1/60 second.

480P. Enhanced definition TV signal with 480 active scanning lines, progressive ("p") scanning and a rate of 60 frames per second. Used in both digital television broadcasting and progressive scan DVD players.

720P. High definition TV signal with 720 active scanning lines and progressive ("p") scanning. Used in digital television broadcasting.

1080I. High-definition signal with 1,080 scanning lines and interlaced ("i") scanning. This contains up to six times the detail of conventional TV pictures.

CRT - CATHODE RAY TUBE. The most common television display technology, the CRT is a sealed glass envelope in which the inside front surface is coated by phosphors. The phosphors glow when excited by an electron beam — the cathode ray. CRTs are used for both direct-view and projection televisions.

DIGITAL CINEMA SOUND SYSTEM. A group of Sony developments that represents a total rethinking of home theater sound. Produces the sound that movie directors intended by recreating the precise acoustics of three post-production dubbing stages in Hollywood.

DLP - DIGITAL LIGHT PROCESSING. When a DLP chip is coordinated with a digital video or graphic signal, a light source and a projection lens, its mirrors can reflect a digital image onto a screen or other surface.

DVD-VIDEO. Immensely popular video playback system, for which more 10,000 titles already have been published. Some say that DVD stands for "Digital Versatile Disc." Some say "Digital Video Disc." In fact, the format's inventors could not agree. Officially, DVD doesn't stand for anything.

HIGH DEFINITION. A new type of free, over-the-air TV broadcasting with up to six times the picture detail (resolution) of conventional, Standard Definition broadcasting. The National Association of Broadcasters reports that 885 television stations are broadcasting a digital TV signal and that 60 network TV series are being broadcast in High Definition.

LCD - LIQUID CRYSTAL DISPLAY. A television display type that uses a viscous liquid and a mesh of transistors to turn pixels on and off. LCDs are used in both direct-view and projection television. In both cases, LCDs require a light to generate brightness.

PLASMA. A flat panel television display type in which plasma gas pixels glow when excited by electrodes.

PROJECTION. A television display system that projects the image as light onto a screen. Front projectors are located out among the audience and project on a reflective, white screen. Rear projectors are self-contained boxes that project onto a translucent screen.

WIDESCREEN. Programming and video systems that incorporate an aspect ratio wider than the conventional 4:3 television screen. In video, widescreen means 16:9, which equals a ratio of picture width to height of 1.778:1. Movies can use several widescreen formats, including a ratio of 2.35:1.

Stylish practicality

JONATHAN CASTNER

Glass can be used as a design statement for residential and commercial buildings. The improvements in glass with high-performance glazing and special coatings that improve energy-efficiency are giving architects and designers a more practical material with which to work.

JONATHAN CASTNER

Peter Heinz, principal of PEH Architects in Boulder, said some types of glass can help block the sun's damaging ultraviolet rays. Heinz installed this protective type of glass at Art Source International on Pearl Street in Boulder, a store that specializes in rare antique maps.

Incorporating glass into building design blends artistry with energy efficiency

BY KEELY BROWN

Business Report Correspondent

When it comes to green building practices, the last thing you might think of is glass.

But according to Peter Heinz, principal of PEH Architects in Boulder, the type of glass you use can play an important role in creating an energy-efficient environment.

"Glass isn't what it used to be," he said. "Installers used to roll it out in sheets called plate glass. It didn't have any properties other than transparency, and it had to be stiff enough to be dimensionally stable in a window frame. Now we have all sorts of glazing — specialty glazing and high-performance glazing — and glass that is modified to have specific characteristics."

Many of today's commercial buildings, Heinz said, have windows with high-performance glazing, a special coating on the glass, which reduces the amount of heat coming into the building.

This feature isn't restricted to just commercial buildings. For residential buildings, a type of glass called low-emissivity or low-E glass — coated with a process known as thermal glazing — can keep solar heat out in the summer but allows enough heat in during the winter to produce a natural heat source. This type of glass is especially popular with architects because of the green building requirements currently being implemented.

Some types of glass can reduce the amount of ultraviolet rays coming into a building reducing the damaging effects of the sunlight transmitted inside — a particularly important consideration when archival material needs to be protected. Heinz installed this type of glass in Art Source International on Pearl Street, a store that specializes in rare antique maps.

Glass also can function purely as a design statement for residential and commercial buildings.

"If you're constructing a big building and want to create an illusion that it's not that heavy, you can put light colored or mirrored glass in so that it reflects its surroundings and appears to be smaller than it really is," Heinz said.

Mirrored glass, which was a prevalent design concept for commercial high rises in the 1980s and 1990s, has lost its popularity not only due to tastes changing but also because of the intense glare it produced, Heinz said. Architects today can produce a similar stylish affect by layering a light metal skin on the outside of buildings to give a transparent window effect without the harsh reflective glare or ecological detriments of glass.

"Glass in itself doesn't have good thermal characteristics, so if you skin the entire building in glass it's not energy efficient," Heinz said.

Some large-scale residential developments are beginning to implement larger, commercialstyle windows in order to get a natural power boost from the sun, according to Terry Slade, president of Boulder-based Slade Glass.

While glass is being used to facilitate natural heat and light

Insulating with soybeans

A relatively new type of foam insulation is drawing the attention of some builders. InSULsoy is a polyurethane foam insulation made from 35 percent soybeans.

Soy-based foam provides eco-friendly insulation

BY JENNIFER QUINN

Business Report Correspondent

Petroleum prices are at an all-time high, making vegetable alternatives a promising solution for greener building.

INSULsoy is a polyurethane foam insulation made from 35 percent soybeans and is a comparable alternative to traditional fiberglass insulation, but it does cost more.

Roger Sims, partner of Colorado Foam Insulation LLC, an INSULsoy Western regional distributor, said by using the soy foam insulation, energy bills could be approximately 75 percent of what they would be if you had fiberglass insulation.

"INSULsoy works just as well as the petroleum-based product," Sims said. "The cost difference in materials is zero. People should be using this product because the end result is the same, and it's better for the environment."

INSULsoy is manufactured in Georgia by Indus Specialties LLC. It has an R-value, which measures the resistance to heat flow, of approximately 3.7 per inch, which is slightly less than the average fiberglass R-value. Builders and architects have the choice of using INSULsoy as either open or closed cell foam, depending on the size of the cavity being insulated.

“My commitment is to make a difference in the building community and our environment. It's great to be able to offer a product that helps Boulder's green movement. I anticipate more people will be using this product in the future.”

Roger Sims
PARTNER,
COLORADO FOAM INSULATION LLC

The installation process requires specialized equipment that mixes two components together using heat. Once mixed, the components turn into foam when sprayed. The foam expands to fill in any holes or gaps and then becomes hard and rigid within seconds. Spray foam works well because it seals the house airtight to prevent any leaks or loss of heat.

Sims said INSULsoy is best for new construction and remodels because it's difficult to retrofit into homes unless the dry wall is removed. He has used the soy insulation in more than 20 homes and estimates that approximately 100 Boulder homes have been insulated using spray foam.

INSULsoy is sold worldwide.

"My commitment is to make a difference in the building community and our environment," Sims said. "It's great to be able to offer a product that helps Boulder's green movement. I anticipate more people will be using this product in the future."

Roland Voss, president and chief executive officer of Tri-Town Insulation Corp. in Firestone, said INSULsoy works well but is more difficult to work with than traditional petroleum-based insulation.

"It is more finicky," Voss said. "It is heat-temperature sensitive. You will not get the proper results if the material being sprayed, the outside air temperature and the temperature of the material in the barrel are not correct."

Voss would like to see all builders use INSULsoy because it is made from renewable material, and he considers it the insulation of the future.

Although the new bio-based product is healthier for the environment it also costs up to four times more to install the foam insulation than the fiberglass insulation. So if two from rear screen with DLP, LCD or CRT, or a flat screen that can be either a plasma or LCD. The screen may be motorized — where it comes down from the ceiling — or it may be fixed. Either option can have motorized curtains, which open via remote control.

The remote control can be programmed to make the lights go down, the curtains open and the movie start.

“Companies like us, we program the remote controls for one-button operation,” Fisher said.

Fischer said an important aspect of creating a home theater is wiring.

“Put in as much (wire) as possible so when you get the home theater you don’t say, ‘Oh, I forgot this,’ and break into the wall.”

He said it adds value to the home to be able to say the home is pre-wired for audio, video and networks. He added that home theaters are perhaps in their heyday right now.

The next step will be even more high tech. “They’re called ... media rooms. You can integrate computers and games. It’s a little move away from theater.”

Terry Olkin is a homeowner with a home theater built by Dreher.

Dreher started with some demolition in Olkin’s finished basement. The company then had to wall off the windows and place speakers into the walls.

“My biggest limitation was space. That was my first concern,” Olkin said.

He wanted to seat at least eight and get as big a screen as possible. He put in theater chairs plus a couch facing a 110-inch screen, but the room was a little narrow.

To mitigate the narrowness Dreher made the walls flush.

“It makes it look really very smart,” Olkin said.

Careful attention was paid to make sure the walls were acoustic. “Sound is pretty important to me. I like to feel it,” Olkin said.

The controls also had to be easy to operate.

THE REMOTE CONTROL CAN BE programmed to make the lights go down, the curtains open and the movie start.

“That was important. My in-laws had to be able to operate it, so it couldn’t be too complicated,” Olkin said.

He made few compromises, and said the process was “surprisingly painless.”

He feels comfortable with the investment. He and his children use the theater several times a week. They also have Super Bowl parties and other events.

“It’s almost like a new way of entertaining,” Dreher said. “You have that fun time at the dinner table then you go to watch a movie, and you talk about it.”

identical 1,800-square-foot homes needed insulation, the fiberglass insulation would cost $1,800, and INSULsoy insulation would cost approximately $4,000.

Gary Gray, managing partner for Indus Specialties LLC, said his product has developed a new market for farmers.

"We can reduce the level of petroleum-based products being used and use a renewable product in its place," Gray said. "Every little bit helps, especially with the cost of petroleum. We can use the soy in the product and replace all the soy that we used in a six- to eight-month span."

Neil Poulsen, chief building official for the city of Boulder, said INSULsoy appears to be a good product in comparison to the many different insulation options available to consumers.

"Public competition allows for choices, so people can pick a product based on price and options," Poulsen said. "It is something new, but there are other products out there that are green. It is always good to see expanded technology and more green products."

But not everyone believes that soy-based products are the only answer.

Buzz Burrell, owner of Bolder Building in Boulder, said he has not used INSULsoy because he uses cellulose insulation, a recycled paper product, instead.

"I have only used cellulose and never used fiberglass," Burrell said. "Soy insulation products work well, but cellulose is also a good product."

Russ Heffley, owner of East Wind Services Inc., a home-building and renovation company in Jamestown, said INSULsoy is a great product for green building and performs at a high rate compared to fiberglass.

"I have never been an advocate of fiberglass because it performs poorly and causes health hazards," Heffley said. "The homeowners I have dealt with who used INSULsoy are happy with its performance, and the energy saving pays for itself over a few years."

The high cost of INSULsoy can be a deterrent to some builders. Heffley said, regardless of the environmental benefits, it is difficult to move the construction industry away from fiberglass to new green product options because of the upfront cost difference.

into homes, it still continues to function as a trendy design element, particularly in contemporary homes and remodels.

One current trend in homes, Slade said, is to install a certain type of thick, heavy, European-style glass for use in kitchen and bathroom countertops. The overall look is elegant, functional and is particularly popular in extended countertop space such as breakfast bars.

Another stylistic touch popular with homeowners is the use of glass on staircases. While glass treads are sometimes used on stairs — a problematic use, Slade warns, because the glass can break — glass can safely and stylishly be incorporated into handrails. In fact, Slade said, this trendy feature has been prevalent for some years on airport escalators and is just now being seen in homes.

Exterior window treatments have also gotten an upgrade in recent years, thanks to vinyl and polyvinyl chloride-based framing, which has taken the place of old-fashioned metal or wood frames. According to Slade, this plastic never needs to be repainted, is more durable than wood, and unlike metal can repel cold and water, protecting damage to the dry wall.

“One trend of the future that we’re hearing about is fiberglass window framing, which has the strength of metal but is much more energy efficient and stronger than vinyl framing,”

Slade said. “Fiberglass is just starting to hit the marketplace on commercial buildings, and it’s already being used in some residential.”

In the end, Heinz said, there’s really no trend to follow when it comes to the many ways to incorporate glass into your building design.

“It’s all in the context of where the development is located,” he said. “Ultimately, every building is a result of the architect’s vision.”

The Boulder County Business Report is committed to the value of green business.

Reach innovative businesses and homeowners ready to buy and build green.

Building Green Page

Sponsored by the City of Boulder's office of Environmental Affairs and supported by the Boulder Green Building Guild – the Building Green page reports on specific events, products and services making news in our local built green communities.

Publishes 6 times a year

The Green Page

A monthly editorial page reporting on businesses tackling different environmental issues and reporting on emerging eco-friendly products and services. The Green Page, which is sponsored each month by Roche Colorado and PACE, has been a Business Report feature before the word "green" really took off!

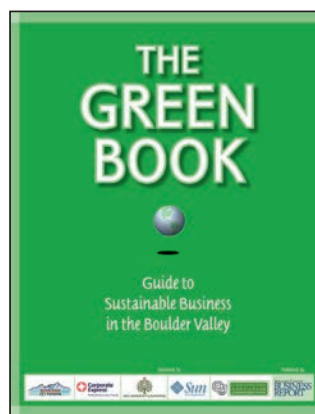

Publishes 6 times a year

Green Building Guide

An annual special report on eco-friendly building practices. This guide will report on trends and innovations in sustainable construction and design.

Publishes March 2009

The Green Book

Featuring editorial on Boulder Valley's dedication to leading the way in sustainable living and business practices, featuring stories on such topics as science and policy, transportation, energy, green financing and building.

Publishes October 2008

Blueprints Directory

An annual directory reporting current news and trends in the local building and design industry. With a focus on residential home building and remodeling services, Blueprints is the homeowner's local guide to local construction, design and remodeling companies.

WE DON'T OFFER property.

WE DON'T OFFER liability.

WE DON'T OFFER auto.

THE one THING WE DO OFFER IS workers' compensation.

COMFORTING, ISN'T IT?

Our philosophy? Do one thing and do it very, very well. By focusing on workers' compensation insurance, we believe we're able to provide the smartest, most comprehensive solutions for Colorado businesses. In fact, we're there for our customers before, during, and after a claim with accident prevention programs, quick and accurate claims management, and valuable return-to-work programs. No wonder Pinnacol Assurance is the most trusted workers' compensation company in the state. For more information, contact us or your agent today.
